The first is that the people of the church, at the festivals and consecrations of the church, or at the patron saints' feasts, treated the sacrament so lightly, as if it were a jiggery-pokery, for the sake of eating, drinking, and making money, ran up to it crudely and insolently, and afterwards became full, and dined and gambled, and fought; as all the villages were full of the shameful abuse, and yet neither atonement nor correction, nor is it recognized as sin by the despairing popes. But it is nothing compared to the wicked abuse, since they have perverted and changed the sacrament, and have made of the common sacrament of the common faith a work of their own and a sacrifice of some persons, as the priests. This is so terrible that I do not like to think about it; the thoughts might well kill me.

(75) Nor is this above this abomination, that they have hidden and concealed the words of the sacrament and the faith, that (as I said) not one letter, not one jot of it has remained in all the papacy, in all the masses, and in all the books. This vice surpasses all words and thoughts, and no one can reproach or punish it enough in eternity. Every other vice has its own devil, or group of devils that do it; but the sacrificial mass, I think, is a common work of all devils, since they have joined all hands, all counsel, all thoughts, all malice, and all mischievousness, and have instituted and preserved this abomination. This is evident from the fact that the spirits of the poltergeists have asked for the mass throughout the world, in all corners, as departed souls; no soul has ever desired or asked for Christ, all for the mass. This is also a strong sign that the devils live nowhere so powerfully as in their servants of the Mass, with all fornication, avarice, blasphemy, and all vices most profusely, and will certainly be the greatest and last wrath of God on earth before the Last Day; for there can be no greater wrath. Then thou shalt have the right virtue of the priesthood, for which thou shalt have war, and shalt shed thy blood for the hardened blasphemers, murderers of souls, and evildoers.

76 Whether any man shall say here, that I am too much of a knave, and can do no more than knave and reproach, let him first be thus answered.

2)	So	Walch.	In	the	other	editions:	"beautiful".
----	----	--------	----	-----	-------	-----------	--------------

That such reproach is nothing to unspeakable wickedness. For what kind of reproach is it if I call the devil a murderer, a villain, a traitor, a blasphemer, a liar? It is as if the breeze did blow at him. But what are these devils but devils in the flesh, who have no repentance but vain hardened hearts, and who knowingly defend such public blasphemy, and seek protection in it from Caesar and from you? Rather chide and call a pabstle what thou wilt or canst, it is as if a goose whistled at him. He hath so much power that he hath been much, much, much too great for thy chiding. Call him a papist, and thou hast said more than the world can understand; thou canst not reproach him more. The other is as if thou didst poke a bear with a straw, or strike a rock with a feather.

77 Secondly, this is my answer, that the two cardinals, Campegius and Salzburg, have admonished and commanded me to do this, so that the one says: he wants to be torn apart before he wants to change or abolish the mass. So says the other: The priests are not good; they should be left unreformed. But these two are of the noblest, and as they speak and believe, so of course the pope speaks and believes with all the papists. Because they themselves say that they are desperate evildoers, and want to remain evildoers, and let themselves be torn apart before they want to renounce blasphemies, I would do them injustice before God and before the world if I called them anything but by their own name, which they themselves give them. Should I now call them Most reverend, holy fathers in Christ, no one would know them, and they themselves would not know of whom I spoke, because they do not know such names, but are and remain hardened evil-doers and blasphemers. Therefore my rebuke is no rebuke, but as when I call a turnip a turnip, an apple an apple, a pear a pear.

78. where will you bear the abominable idolatries, since they did not care enough to honor the saints and to praise God in them, but made vain gods out of them, and put the noble child, the mother Mary, badly in Christ's place, and Christ

And he made up a tyrant to the wretched consciences, that all confidence and consolation was taken from Christ, and turned unto Mary, after that every man turned unto his saint from Christ. Can anyone deny this? Is it not true? Have we not all tried and experienced it? Alas! Are there not, especially of the shameful barefooted and preaching monks, books full of such idolatry as the Marialia, Stellaria, Rosaria, Coronaria, and quite vain Diabolaria and Satanaria? There is still no repentance here, nor amends, but with the head through and obdurate such everything defended, and your life and limb demanded for protection.

Seventy-nine: I must show here a piece from the Diet of Augsburg, that it may be seen how excellent a reason they have for such idolatry of the saints. As the committee was dealing with this article on the invocation of the saints, D. Eck brought forth the saying, Gen. 48:16, where Jacob speaks of Ephraim and Manasseh: Lt invoostur Nomen M6UM 8upsr pueros istos, and after many words Magister Philippi He Johann Brenz spoke approximately: one finds nothing in Scripture about the invocation of the saints. Then D. Cochläus, as a deeply thoughtful man, came forward to help the matter, and said that the fact that the saints were not called upon in the Old Testament was the cause that the saints at that time were not yet in heaven, but in the outer castle of the hells. Then my gracious lord, Duke Johann Friederich, Duke of Saxony 2c., tightened the noose over them both, and said to D. Eck: There you have, D. Eck, answered for your sentence, which you have brought forth from the Old Testament! So sure are they of their things, so well do they agree with one another, the excellent writers of the Antilogiarum. One of them says, "In the Old Testament the saints were not invoked," and the other says, "Yes. And they quote sayings from the Old Testament, as if they did not know that God, for the sake of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, did all the great miracles that were done in the Old Testament, as he himself often confesses, and that for the sake of no saint in the New Testament he did half as much, yes, ten times as much. Like fools, what falls into their mouths they spit out quickly; nor must the articles of faith be just and reasonable.

80 And that we may once give an example in such a long sermon, I will tell you now, out of so many thousand examples, that which is written in a Marial, how one ought to honor the Virgin Mary with sacrifices. There was a thief or highwayman who did nothing good all his life, but once or other came into a church for Our Lady's light mass, and saw people offering pennies and candles on the altar. There he also sacrificed. Then he was seized and hanged. Then the devils wanted to lead his soul to hell, but a good angel resisted them and said, "Why do you devils lead him away, since you have nothing in him? They answered: "He has done much evil, and never any good. So they went with one another before the court of God. And the devils accused the sinner of doing no good; but the good angel brought forth the penny stamped with the cross, together with the candle offered upon the altar. Then the judge gave the verdict: "The striker should defend himself against the devils," and the angel advised him to take the penny in his left hand, for a shield, and the candle in his right hand, for a sword or spear, and to fight against the devils and to strike the cross vainly; this he did, and drove out the devils. And the soul returned to the body, and was taken from the gallows, and did well in his life. Haec ille.

81. Who could conceive it if it were not true? The monks and priests have clicked so many books full of such shameful fables that they have overwhelmed Christendom as with a flood of sin. No pope, bishop, or doctor has ever heeded or been aware of all this. But now that it is preached that Christ is our Saviour, they become mad and senseless. But when they preached that a candle and a crucifix offered to our Lady might save an impenitent rogue and murderer, without Christ, without faith, and drive out all devils, and blaspheme and suppress Christ's passion and life, then all the preaching was good and delicious, there were no heretics. But it all belongs to this: priests have never been good!

(82) How will thy conscience bear the great affliction, torment, and violence, which they have inflicted on all the world with their fearful confession, so that they have made so many souls desperate, and have robbed and increased all Christian consolation from the wretched consciences, since they have so treacherously and wickedly concealed and kept silent the power of absolution and faith, insisting only on the unbearable torment and impossible work of telling and repenting of sins. To such repentance and telling, as to our own work, we have promised grace and salvation, so that Christ has pointed us to ourselves and kept us. In sum, everything they teach and do is designed to lead us from Christ to their work and ours. And no letter so small in their doctrine, and no work so small, denies and blasphemes Christ, and defiles faith in him, and leads poor hearts to impossible things and to despair. And so should the true antichrist do, that he, according to his name, should teach and live abundantly against Christ, and exalt himself above God and his word [2 Thess. 2:4]. This we see fulfilled in the papacy more than can be understood. All this is still unpunished; we still defend this confession today, and we also want you to help us fight through this torture, heartache, despair, and all the plagues of this confession, and to burden yourself with the sorrow of all souls.

(83) You must take upon yourself the grievous lamentation and cursed abuse of the ban and the keys, which abuse alone would have been sufficiently deserved to bring the papacy to ruin, let alone to fight to confirm and strengthen it. How has the pope raved and raged against emperors, kings, and all the world, yes, against God himself and his holy word! What the devil has put into his heart must be right and good. How much war and blood has he wrought with it in all the world! And who can tell all the abominations? What he would have for sin, that must be called sin and be sin. What he has wanted to be holy, that must be holy. Hereby he has been a terrible lord over the whole world, over body, soul, goods, country and people, over purgatory, over hell, over devils, over heaven, over angels, over God and everything. To whom he has willed, heaven has been open and closed, hell has been closed and opened. Whose body, goods, honor, land, kingdom, wife, child, house, farm, money, and all things were taken from him or remained for him. And what would the papacy be without the abuse of the key?

1660 EE. (2.) 25.42-44. sect. 11. the other imperial decree. No. 1156 W. XVI, 2W9-20U. 1661

(84) Now they have done all this out of sheer willfulness, since they had no right to do so, for the sake of their belly and their dominion. And, worst of all, they misused God's name in the most shameful way. For under God's name they have committed all such unspeakable abominations, ravings, and ravings, for which they have not a single thought that they would mend it; but like hard anvils, obdurate, they let themselves be beaten, and remain firm on such a resolution, wanting to have everything defended and strengthened by your blood and protection. It is no wonder that heaven and earth should tear and break over such desperate, defiant wickedness, and that God should suffer such unrelenting wickedness, such defiance and abuse 1) for so long.

85. I think that if the Turk knew that he was so unjust, as the papists know that they are such desperate evil-doers, he would not be so obdurate, and would not so insolently defy God with his wickedness. For I hold that the Turk would not speak, namely, We Turks have never been good, as our Papists speak: We priests have never been good. In short, only the devil does this; he also knows that he is evil and wants to defend his wickedness. The priesthood does the same; it recognizes such its terrible wickedness, and wants to have it unamended, confirmed, and defended by your body and blood. If now thou hast a mind to dispute, here thou wilt find a just cause for the most holy and spiritual people. But consider the hundred thousand parts of such wickedness, of which thou wouldst make thyself a party, and the pleasure of such strife shall pass thee by, and thou shalt say, I would let such unrepentant arch-villains have the infernal fire in the abyss of hell, before I would stir up a thread about theirs.

1) "Mißbieten" (Missebieten) - disrespectfulness.

for her sake, keep silent, that I should risk my life and limb for her.

Item: You must take upon yourself and help to strengthen the devil's dangerous, lying, shameful folly, which they have practiced with the sanctuary and pilgrimages, and have not yet thought to atone for. Help God, how it has snowed and rained here, yes, how it has fallen like a cloud breast, with lies and cheating! How the devil has used up dead bones, clothes and utensils for the legs and utensils of the saints! How surely have all lying mouths been believed! How one has run to the pilgrimages; which all the pope, bishops, priests, monks have confirmed, or ever kept silent to the least, and let the people err, and taken the money and goods. What hath the new fraud at Treves done with Christ's skirt? What has the devil held here a great fair in all the world, and sold so innumerable false miraculous signs! Ah, what is it that any man may speak of this? If all the leaves and grass were tongues, they alone could not utter this knavery. We must still see that they do not confess or repent of it, but that they preserve, strengthen, and amend it through your body and blood.

87 And the worst of all is, that they have deceived men herewith, and have drawn them away from Christ, to trust and build upon such lies. For no one has run after the sanctuary or pilgrimage; he has placed his confidence and comfort in it, and has had to despise his Christ at home, the gospel and faith, and his position, and consider it as nothing. But the papists have not only not feasted on such seduction of souls, such denial and contempt of Christ and his faith, but have taken pleasure and delight in it, and have adorned and strengthened it with indulgences and graces, and have well feasted on it, and have scourged and abused all the world; nor is there any improvement or atonement, but a vain defiant resolution to increase and strengthen all this, and to suffer no evil innovation.

(88) Here is the golden year, which the arch-deceivers, the popes, have invented, and commanded the angels to lead the souls of pilgrims to heaven. But all and all is too high and too much, above all speaking and remembering. It is said: Abominatio in loco sancto, "abomination in the holy place" [Dan. 9:27], which is what Christ called Pabstism, with a simple, yet incomprehensible word (Matth. 24:15). I mean that the ministry is an abomination, not only with such evil things, but also with impenitence, that it does not want to amend such things, but to defend them; and therefore sins not only with the deed itself, but confirms such sin with impenitence, that is, with sins in the Holy Spirit, so that it cannot get higher, nor become worse. For the devil himself cannot sin higher nor worse.

(89) Behold, these are the fellows who would be judges of the word of God, who would have us revoke and repent of our doctrine. Item, that we should worship all such abominations for God's word and work; they want to be unreformed, and in short suffer no innovation. Does not this mean stirring up sedition? What does stirring up sedition mean? Does it not mean pestilence, evil times, Turks, war, murder, and arousing all God's wrath and plague, what is so evil that may arouse? But I must here cease to stir up the abominations, so many as are behind, more than there are the brotherhoods, vows to saints, and the great fair, where the priests and monks of all the world sold their good works and caps, and clothed them in death, and led them to heaven. Otherwise, all the senses would dwindle and pass away; alas, there is too much in half a part of a piece.

90 The third reason that thou shalt not obey Caesar in this charge is, that thou shalt not alone bring such abominations upon thyself, and help to strengthen them, but shalt also help to overthrow and cut off all the good that is raised up and brought on by the good gospel. For the evil-doers will not have enough of it, that they should bring forth such devilry and abominations, and (as they command in the edict) tolerate no innovation, but cut it off, and utterly destroy all that we have ever taught, lived, and done, and still do and live.

91. This cause also comprehends much in itself. For our Gospel, praise God, has much in it. great good has been accomplished. No one knew before what the gospel was, what Christ was, what baptism was, what confession was, what the sacrament was, what faith was, what the Spirit was, what the flesh was, what good works were, what the ten commandments were, what the Lord's Prayer was, what suffering was, what comfort was, what worldly authority was, what marriage, what parents, what children, what masters, what servants, what wives, what maidservants, what devils, what angels, what world, what life, what death, what sin, what justice, what forgiveness of sins, what God, what bishop, what priest, what church, what a Christian, what the cross; Summa, we have known nothing at all that a Christian should know. Everything is obscured and suppressed by the Pabstles. They are asses, and great, coarse, unlearned asses in Christian matters. For I too have been one, and know that I speak the truth in this, and all pious hearts will testify to this, who, being imprisoned under the pope as well as myself, would have liked to know such things, and neither could nor should have known them; we knew no other way, for priests and monks were all alone, and on their works we rested, and not on Christ.

92. But now, praise God, it is come to pass that man and woman, young and old, know the Catechism, and how one ought to believe, live, pray, suffer, and die. And it is a beautiful instruction for the conscience, how one should be a Christian and know Christ; one preaches now of faith and good works. And summa, the above-mentioned pieces have come to light again, and preaching stands, altar and baptismal font have been restored. altar and baptismal font have been restored so that, praise God, a Christian church can once again be recognized. But you must help to eradicate and destroy all these things where you war for the papists. For they do not want to suffer any of the things taught and done by us, but (as they say) to have the possession; to sit again in the old guarantees, and to tolerate no innovation at all; so you must help to burn all German books, the New Testament, the Psalter, the prayer book, the hymnal, and everything that we have written of many good things, which they themselves confess. You must help that no one knows the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the faith (for this is what happened before). Thou must help that no one may know of baptism,

1664 Erl. (2.) 25, 47-49. sec. 11. the other imperial decree. No. 1156 s. W. XVI, 2V14-2V17. 1665

Sacrament, faith, authority, matrimony, nor learn anything from the Gospel. You must help that no one knows Christian freedom. You must help to ensure that no one puts his trust and comfort in Christ. For all these things were not before, and are mere novelties.

Item 93: You must help that our priests' and preachers' children, poor abandoned orphans, are condemned and disgraced as children of whores. You must help them to rely on the work of the monks and priests in Christ's stead, and to buy their merit and their caps at the point of death. You must help them to fill Christendom with fornication, adultery, and other unnatural, shameful vices instead of marriage. Thou must help to set up again the abominable fair of sacrificial fairs. You must help to defend all their avarice, robbery, and theft, so that they may get their goods. And what shall I tell much? Thou must help to destroy Christ's word and all his kingdom, and to rebuild the devil's kingdom. For that is where the evil-doers want to go, who press for the possessorium, or the old warrant. They are of the end of Christ, or antichrist; therefore they can do nothing else, but that which is against Christ. Especially in the main article, that our heart should not put its comfort and confidence in our works, but in Christ alone, that is, to be freed from sins and justified by faith alone, as it is written, Rom. 10:10, "With the heart one believeth, and is justified."

(94) This article, I say, they will not suffer, and so we cannot counsel against it. For where the article is gone, the church is gone, and no error can be withstood, because apart from this article the Holy Spirit will not nor cannot be with us; for he is to transfigure Christ to us. Over this article the world has so often come to ruin, through flood, weather, waters, war, and all plagues. Over this article Habet was slain, and all the saints, and all Christians must die over it. Nevertheless it remained, and must remain, and the world must perish for ever over it. So let it also now stand, and be overthrown above the article: and if it be mad and foolish, let it leave the article, and let it fall over it into the covert of the earth, amen.

95. Now consider, and come to your senses, if you will fight against God and his word, and all that is God's; if you will bring upon yourself all the abominations of the priesthood, and all the innocent blood that has been shed from heaven; if you will help to destroy all the good things that have happened to us through the gospel, and finally, if you will destroy Christ's kingdom, and build the devil's kingdom: then see what victory thou shalt obtain, and with what conscience thou shalt be obedient to the imperial command!

006 If then thou be advised, thou hast warning enough in this, that thou shalt not be obedient to Caesar and thy prince in such a case, as the apostles say (Acts 5:29), "One must be more obedient to God than to men." If thou wilt follow, it is well; if thou wilt not, let it be, and go always, and contend confidently. Christ shall not be afraid of thee, and shall (whether GOd will) also abide before thee. But if he tarry, let him give thee enough to fight: meanwhile let us see which shall prevail against the other, and keep the field.

(97) This I have said to my dear Germans as a warning; and as above, so also I testify here that I do not wish to incite or provoke anyone to war, nor to rebellion (nor to counter-rebellion), but only to peace. But where our devils, the papists, do not want to keep peace, but with such obdurate abominations, unpunished, raging against the Holy Spirit, nevertheless get it, and would bring bloody heads from it, or even go down, I hereby publicly testify that I have not done such, nor given cause for it; but they want it so, their blood be on their head, I am excused, and have done my part most faithfully. Henceforth I will let him judge who will, should, and can judge; he will not fail, nor lack. To him be praise and honor, thanksgiving and glory forever and ever, amen.

After the latter we give the text.

Martin Luther's condition.

(1) I Martin Luther, Doctor of the Holy Scriptures, and preacher of the Christians at Wittenberg, herewith state in this public writing, that all that I write against this supposed imperial edict or commandment in this little book, I do not mean to speak nor to understand as written against imperial majesty or some authority, spiritual or secular, but because the wise King Solomon saith [Eccl. 9, 18.] that a few wicked men at court can create great misfortune, and again, a few pious Naaman [2 Kings. 5, 1.] can do much good at court, I do not mean by this the pious emperor, nor the pious lords, but the traitors and evil-doers (be they princes or bishops), who under the imperial name, or (as Solomon says) at court, undertake to accomplish their desperate, wicked will of courage, and especially the fellow whom St. Paul calls God. Paul calls God's adversary, I should say, God's governor, the chief shawl, Pope Clement, and his servant Campegium, and the like. This is my opinion, God grant happiness and grace to it, amen.

(2) First, before I gloss over this edict from piece to piece, I must first point out the Holy Spirit who breathed such wisdom into these evil-doers, so that the master might first be known; from this it will become clear what teaching such a master can and will give. They boast in the edict, first of all, how the confession of ours, which is delivered at Augsburg, is mislaid and rejected by the holy gospels. That is one thing; mark it well, my dear friend, who You hear (I say) that they boast that the confession of ours is displaced and rejected by the holy Gospels. Whether this be true or not, I will hereafter consider. Now thou only shalt know that they say that the confession of ours is mislaid. With what? With the holy gospels (they say). That is what they say. 1)

(3) Then they themselves say in the Edict, that the Christian Church, by inspiration of the Holy Ghost and good causes, hath ordained to use one form of the Sacrament. And, that wisdom may have the greater prestige, they add the cause that under one form there is as much as under both. These may be called excellent and cheap imperial poets and scribes! But where is the master here, who may tune these pipes together? Namely, that they say: our confession is laid down by the holy Gospels, and yet the One Form is ordered by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. This is as much as to say both no and yes. For if both forms (which our confession presents) are displaced by the holy gospels, the one form is of course also confirmed at the same time by the same gospels; where else could one displace both forms, if one should not confirm the one just with them?

004 Again, if the One Form is established by the intercession of the Holy Spirit, they themselves herewith confess that it is not by the holy Evangelia (as they lie), but by the intercession of their Holy Spirit, that both forms are established, and the One Form confirmed; for the Evangelia and the intercession of the Holy Spirit make them two things, as is evident in the day. If then the intercession has done it, why do they lie so shamefully and insolently that the holy Evangelia have done it? If the holy evangelicals have done it, why do they boast so shamefully and falsely that it was done by the intercession? Is not this to be called a fine hiding in one's cheeks, and a shitting in one's wisdom? He that will lie, let him have a good memory (say the Greeks). But to lie against God and his word must be especially well done, as can be seen in the praiseworthy example in this edict.

1) "sounded," that is, that had good sound.

005 Well, there we have the chief poet of this edict, the spirit of the pope, the father of all lies, who must thus prove his wisdom by the word of God, that it stinks of his old dung. The good that has been done in the whole edict by such servants of the faithful and liars is well to be reckoned with. For against their own consciences, they have been obstinate and malicious in saying that our confession was laid down in the Gospels, when they knew full well that it was all lies and lies, and that their defiance and glory were based solely on their own minds, and not on the Gospels. Wherefore they also, without their thanks, had to spew out such their false heart and conscience in this edict, as Christ saith [Matt. 12:34.], "When the heart is full, the mouth overflows." And again [v. 37.], "Out of thine own words thou shalt be damned." So these shameful poets also had to betray and disgrace themselves by their own mouths, that one might learn what it is to rage against God and His Word. Of such beautiful lies we want to show more throughout the whole edict, so that the saying may stand [Prov. 21, 30.]: "No wisdom helps against God"; and the 33rd Psalm, v. 10: "God brings the plots of princes to nothing."

006 In the first place, that they boast that our confession is mislaid by the holy gospels, this is such a manifest lie, that they themselves well know that it is a shameful lie; but with such make-up they want to prettify themselves, and revile us, because they well felt that their doctrine was full of holes, leprous, and foul, and yet should come to honor under such a cloak. Her heart thought, "We know that our church is wicked, but let us say that the Lutheran church has been laid, and that will be enough; who will force us to make such a lie true? For if they had not felt that such a boast was a vain lie, they would not only have gladly denied their transfer, as is greatly desired, but would also have sent it out through all the printing presses and proclaimed it with all the trumpets and drums, and such defiance would have arisen that the sun could not well have shone before it. But now the same If they so shamefully refuse to publish the confession, and still more shamefully hide and conceal it, their evil consciences bear witness to the fact that they lie as evil-doers when they boast that our confession has been published, and that with such lies they seek not the truth but our displeasure and their cover of shame.

7th On the other hand, it is also quite a knavery to disparage us, and to adorn themselves with cunning, that they relate various articles, of which the greater part do not concern us, only that they want to make a stink about us to strangers and strangers, whom they lead into the poisonous abode, as if we also taught such articles. Such boys should not be imperial scribes or poets, but the wretched devil's scribes in hell. For since they knew well that we do not teach such articles, but rather condemn them, it would have been expedient for imperial poets to speak differently of old articles, and to interpret to each part its own, especially since one speaks of them in judgment, and condemns them. Now they mix all things together, and make us guilty in all; that this some wickedness is greater than I can excuse, and cannot be looked at otherwise than as if they should be so called: We knowingly and willfully do violence and injustice to the good people.

008 These are the fellows, as David saith in Psalms 36:2 and following, Verily I say, The wicked are wicked men. For there is no fear of God in them. That they may promote their wicked cause above, they adorn themselves, and revile others. "2c. The Hot painted them right. For in this shameful, lying edict, they have taken the greatest pains to adorn themselves by boasting that our confession has been laid; and again, to disparage us by mixing all kinds of articles together, and it is a miserable patchwork, no different from a beggar's cloak. For I have heard that this edict has been changed five times, and many things have been done to it; yet nowhere has it gained a nose that would suit it, but they have not seen that a false tongue betrays a false heart, and that the calumny that has been forced on others with lies	must	fall	on	their	own	heads.

009 Let this be said of the spirit and master of this edict. Now let us take it in pieces before us, and bring the devil's lies to light. The first lie is, that they boast (as has been said), that our confession is laid by the holy gospels; but they distinguish nothing, but condemn the whole confession, as if there were nothing good in it, but must call everything laid by the holy gospels, even the high articles of faith, which they themselves have confessed at Augsburg, that there is nothing contrary to faith in our confession, and that they are not to be laid by Scripture. So they give the lie to their own mouths. They must also be called lying to themselves, because they boast that our confession is displaced by the holy gospels, and yet they are ordered by the Holy Spirit to receive the sacrament in one form, which is contrary to all the gospels, and they displace both forms by the gospels. Thus are they fellows, because they cannot prove by the gospels that one form is to be received, they invent the intercession of the Spirit, which shall do it, and yet boast that by the holy gospels our confession is displaced. Dear fellows, this is shamefully confessed with lies!

010 Neither, if their own consciences did not themselves think that their revelation was nothing, would they have refused the same revelation, when the same copy was desired to be answered in writing, but would have let it go forth with great glory and triumph, and have desired to hear the answer thereof. For they are bold, thirsty heroes, who do not shun the light and heretics, especially when they are to murder and blaspheme; but here, when they are to give out their transcripts and have them answered, they are like bats and night owls, who cannot stand the light; so that they bear witness that their own conscience teaches them how such transcripts are pure filth, and boast and lie with their mouths alone: That all things are laid up, which their faint and timid conscience knoweth otherwise, and with such a shunning of the light confesseth otherwise.

II. the other lie is, that they now begin to prove their objection and art, and say, that the Christian church, from objection

The Holy Spirit's intercession and good causes are salutary, and it is commanded that only one form be administered outside of the Mass. 2c. Here thou hearest plainly that both forms of the sacrament (which our confession teaches from the Gospels) are displaced by the intercession of the Holy Ghost, and that one is commanded; and yet we have said above, that our confession is displaced by the holy Gospels. This is a lie, and a very good and cowardly lie to take hold of. But this is still better, that they say that the Christian church, by inspiration of the Holy Spirit, has this power to do, and to command 2c. Where are these seals and letters? Where is the reason and cause, that they may prove it? If it be enough that they thus willfully invent it, we Christians are poor men, who must believe all that the devil's mouths may spout.

012 This lie blasphemeth both the Holy Ghost, and the Christian church; which is by no means to be suffered. For Christ saith [John 16:14.], that the Holy Ghost should come and transfigure him; saith not, that he should change or darken him. Item [John 14:26.], "Let the Holy Ghost remind you (saith he) all things whatsoever I have said unto you"; saith not, let him abolish or change that which I have said. Since then it is clear and evident that Christ teaches both these things in the Gospel, the Holy Spirit must transfigure and remind the same doctrine; if he does not do this, but changes or abolishes it, then it cannot be the Holy Spirit, or Christ must be lying, since he calls the Holy Spirit his transfigureer or praiser, and his words remembrancer. From this it follows, that the speaking, which changes and spoils both forms (though in the Gospel Christ has ordered the same by his word), is not of the Holy Spirit, but of the wicked devil out of hell. For the Holy Ghost is to remind us of all the words and doctrines of Christ, and to glorify them, and to keep them in light and use: if he did not, he would not remind us of all the doctrines and words of Christ, as he ought to do.

013 Thus the lying blasphemy of our most beloved Mother, the Christian Church, is not to be tolerated, that it should be construed to change and exalt her dear Bridegroom's words and

For she is subject unto him (saith St. Paul, Eph. 5:24 ff.), yea, also one body with him: how then should she here disobey, and exalt herself above her God and Lord, that she should not remain one with him, and change his word, and condemn it? which she well knoweth that he hath purchased with his dear blood, and hath most heartily commanded her, saying, "Do this in remembrance of me." Whosoever therefore shall say, that she hath changed this command, and hath not kept it, denieth and blasphemeth her, as an evil-doer and an enemy to both Christ and his church. For whoever may say that the church changes or does not keep Christ's word and order, does as much as to call the holy church a prostitute of the devil gone astray. Therefore we Christians should condemn this edict with all our hearts as a blasphemy against the devil, and say: Cursed be both the edict and its poets, amen.

14 Against such blasphemies we set these thunderbolts, because Christ saith, "Do these things in remembrance of me" [Luc. 22:19, 1 Cor. 11:24, 25]. Which words he speaketh unto his Christian church, and calleth them to do it, and not to alter nor abolish it. Item, Matthew last, "Go ye, and teach all the Gentiles to observe whatsoever I have commanded you" [Matt. 28:19, 20]. Say not, Teach them to amend and abolish that which I have commanded. Item, Matt. 5:18, 19: "Not one jot nor one tittle shall pass from the law; it shall all pass. And he that abolisheth one of the least commandments, and teacheth men so, shall be least in the kingdom of heaven." Item, the Father hath said from heaven, Matt. 17:5, "This one shall ye hear." And long before, Deut. 18:19, "I will raise up a prophet unto them, and will put my words in his mouth, and he shall tell them all things that I shall call him. But whosoever will not hear his words, that will I avenge." Verily these and such like sayings leave the church no power to change or abrogate Christ's word, but cast them under Christ's word, and call them to be kept and done, as an earnest of God's commandment, which he will punish where it is not kept. How much more shall he punish them that do abrogate and change it?

15. and, since God is for, where the Christian church would have power to change God's word and abolish it, we would no longer have any certain word of God. For it is clear that where she can change one word of God, she can also change all the other words of God, even that one, so that she herself may establish and maintain a Christian church. For here there is no reason or difference why she should change one and not the other, because she has power over them. Thus she would change and abolish the ten commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the faith, and herself, so that she would not have to be the devil's whore, as the church of the pope is, which has such power over God's word, and robs her of it with blasphemous sacrilege. Therefore, no Christian here should suffer or consent to such an abominable sacrilege being laid to the holy church in this accursed edict.

016 But whether they would say, Hereby is Christendom spoken too nigh, and is condemned of us, as not keeping Christ's commandment; as they cry out now, saying, The Lutherans condemn all Christendom, which yet keepeth the one form, and doth both; therefore the one form must be right, or the Christian church is condemned. Answer: If we are to answer such criers, I will say this: If it should come to the necessity (as it cannot) that either the church should err, or Christ should lie, I would rather say that the church errs, than that Christ is a liar. For though the church were in error, it would not therefore be condemned, because it has the glorious article: Forgiveness of sins. Yea, if the church did not err nor sin, what need had she of the article, Forgiveness of sins? But if Christ were a liar, all would be lost, and there would be no hope of salvation.

017 The shameful popery and blasphemy magnify that the church is holy, and that it may not err, and thereby maintain all their abominations; but they will not respect these other things, that Christ must not lie nor be absent, and that it is more important that Christ should be true and certain, than that the church should be holy, and not err. Neither is it true that the church erreth not, nor sinneth. For she prayeth daily, Forgive us our sins, [Matt. 6:12] and believeth forgiveness.

of sin, nor is ashamed of the prayer in the Psalm [Ps. 19:13.], "Who perceiveth all sin?" For she yet liveth in the sinful flesh, and saith with St. Paul first Rom. 7:19, "I do evil;" and again, v. 18. 25, "I serve with the flesh the law of sins, and dwell in my flesh no good thing." But of Christ alone, and of none else, is it written, Isa. 53:9, "He hath done no sin, neither is any falsity found in his mouth."

018 Therefore these are great blind guides, which would have all the words and works of the church to be pure and good, that all should be articles of faith. For if she do not do and teach according to the certain word of Christ, but do and teach something apart from that same word, who can make me sure that she does not err and sin therein? Yes, who can doubt that she then certainly errs and sins? because she still lives in the sinful flesh, and acts without the sanctuary, "God's word," and cannot be without sin. The church is holy, that is true; but to be holy does not mean to be without sin and error here on earth, but (as St. Paul says [Eph. 5:27]) to be holy in spirit, through God's word, and yet to be in sins through the flesh, which are forgiven for the Spirit of Christ's sake, but nevertheless do not become articles or truth. For forgiven sin and error is still sin and error, and never becomes right or truth, though it does not condemn. They are gross theologians and blind teachers, who write in their hearts that the holy church is entirely holy and has no sin or error. Such is the poetry of their heads, on which they build so many articles of faith. But the scripture saith otherwise, as it is heard; neither shall any man believe the church itself, where it doeth or speaketh without and apart from the word of Christ. In Christ's word she is holy and sure; apart from Christ's word she is certainly a poor sinner in error, but she is not condemned for Christ's sake, in whom she believes.

019 This I will have said against the stiff-necked boasters, who are always chattering, The church, the church, the church! know not what the church is, nor the holiness of the church; go over it, and make the church so Holy, that Christ above it must be their liar, and his word count for nothing at all. On the other hand, we must also boast again, church be it, church be it, however holy it may be, so Christ must not be a liar. The church itself confesses, both with doctrine, prayer, and faith, that it is a sinner before God, and often errs and sins; but Christ is the truth itself, and can neither lie nor sin. Therefore, as far as the church lives and speaks in the word and faith of Christ, she is holy, and (as St. Paul says) righteous in spirit. But as far as she does and speaks without Christ's word and faith, she errs and sins. But he who makes articles of faith out of such sinful deeds and words of the church, blasphemes both the church and Christ himself as liars. But this is what the blind leader of the pope does, with his blind sophists, who fall down and talk about how all the words and works of the church must be holy and true.

020 And that we may come to the matter: If then the holy church had taken up and changed both forms, it does not follow that it ought to be considered right, because Christ's words are clearly against it, but ought to be considered an error and sin of the church, which ought to be corrected and atoned for after it is known, and not to deny and defend sin with the false Saul, which Samuel calls idolatry [1 Sam. 15:20, 23]. But now the church has not done it, and has not changed the form of both, but has had to suffer it as a free violence of spiritual tyrants, who have robbed such under the church's name according to their will, as murderers; and now, when the church cries out, and demands such robbery again, they still rage, and want to defend their tyrannical robbery against God and Christ's word. But they shall succeed in this, as Cain and Saul succeeded in their raging. The church, which until now has had to suffer such robbery and has been deceived by the false priests, has therefore remained undamaged. For it has not done so, but only suffered and often acted contrary to it. And though she had sinned ignorantly and deceitfully, yet all was forgiven her for Christ's sake, in whom she believeth.

021 It is also evident that there is a very great difference between doctrines and lives, alike-as there is a great difference between heaven and earth. The life may be unclean, sinful, and infirm; but the doctrine must be pure, holy, clean, and constant. The life may be lacking, not keeping all that the doctrine wills; but the doctrine (saith Christ [Matt. 5:18]) needeth not lack a tittle or a letter, though the life lack a whole word or company in the doctrine. For the doctrine is the word of God, and the truth of God itself; but the life is with us. Therefore the doctrine must remain entirely pure; and whoever is lacking in life and is infirm, God may well have patience and forgive; but the doctrine itself, according to which one should live, he cannot and will not suffer, nor should he suffer it. For this touches his high divine majesty itself, where neither forgiveness nor patience is valid; let it then be left in peace and mastered.

022 David had certainly sinned against God's commandment with his life; but since he confessed his sin, and thereby confirmed God's commandment, and did not change it, but rather punished himself than God's commandment, such sin must have been forgiven him, and did no harm. But Saul sinned in such a way that he justified and defended his sin, so that he blasphemed God's commandment and acted as if he were right and God were a liar and wrong; this could not be forgiven him. So here anch, if the church had not only been ignorant and deceived (as has been said), but had also knowingly omitted both figures, when it had not done so, it would not yet have been condemned. For in so doing she would not have denied or abandoned the teachings of God, but would only (like David) have done contrary to God's commandment, which must have been forgiven her because she recognized it. But to force her to condemn the doctrine of both forms, and to defend herself against God's commandment, that is, to call God a liar, and to take her own sin for truth and right, and to boast of it, cannot be forgiven, for it is sin against the Holy Spirit. The church has not done this, nor will it ever do so. She confesses, sings, and confesses freely in public that she sins against the word of God.

knowingly and unknowingly, and asks forgiveness of sins; but she does not deny God's word, nor change it, nor cancel it.

(23) For where the word of God is open, there is no more sin, neither can any man have a conscience, as Paul saith, Rom. 7:7, 8: "Where there was no law, there was no sin." Where there is no sin, there is no forgiveness, nor care or plea for forgiveness; just as the Papists here say, both forms are not God's commandment. Because they hold this, they must continue to say that there is no sin, but that it is right to let both forms stand. But because they have no sin, they may neither ask nor have forgiveness for such sin, and so they go safely into the abyss of hell in their denied sins and blasphemies. Let this be enough to show that mau cannot make an article of faith out of the deed of the church. For she is a sinner and sins daily, both unknowingly and knowingly, and our faith must be based on God's word alone in all articles, and without God's word no article of faith is to be tolerated.

024 Above all this, it is also a lie, that the whole church is therefore condemned of us, if we condemn the doctrine of the one form. For the papal church alone holds, yea, it suffers from the end of Christ the one form, but all other churches in the whole world hold both forms, as they have held from the beginning. And we must likewise consider here that we do not condemn both forms, together with the churches that consider it right, as the papists cry out that their church, caught under the end-christ, should not be condemned. For the other churches hold both forms to be right, and one form to be wrong, and they also avoid them as wrong. If then one form should be held to be right, we would first of all rightly condemn the whole church. Therefore not we (as they cry), but they, the papists, condemn the whole of Christendom, because they hold the One Form to be right, against all the other churches in the world from the beginning, even against the knowledge and will of their church, which lieth captive under them.

025 But this is the chief of all wickedness, and such shameful, impudent

Blasphemy, that it is not to be said. They confess that both forms are right, and they would let us have them at Augsburg, if we would also teach and confess that one form is right. Then hear the wretched devil's mouths; they confess that both forms are right, but where we do not hold the one form to be right, neither shall ours be right. You are right (they say), but such right shall be wrong, such truth shall be a lie, such commandment of God shall be forbidden, such obedience shall be sin, if you do not also give us right in the One Form.

026 What is this but sawing, for God shall be the devil, heaven shall be hell, life shall be death, where ye will not let us be right? Dear God, where is this going? To confess that the word of God is right and true, and yet to condemn, forbid, heresy, rebuke, and to murder and torment people over it, where one does not want to make oneself partaker of their sin, and say that they are also righteous. Why do they not let us have this right, which they themselves confess, and do they go with their one form, without us, wherever they will? If it be right, they will well find it; why will they weigh us down with their trumpery? Yea, why do they pursue the right in us, which they themselves profess? But such a horrible, terrible, angry blasphemy will put an end to the game, and provoke Christ to come; for it is too hard and too much, it will surely tear the sack.

027 I will now leave this alone, because in this edict they condemn them that make vain bread and wine of the sacrament. For now all the world knows well that we do not teach such things, but have opposed them to the highest degree; and it would have been fitting for such Edict's masters to show a little gratitude, and to have praised us in such an article, and not to have mocked us with blind words, as we are not ashamed (praise God!) to praise and extol what we find good in the papal church. For we know, praise God, that if the Lutherans had not received the Sacrament, the Papists would have failed. But let such ingratitude also pass; the pious heretics, the Lutherans (who are their protection and umbrella), do not like them; therefore, let them be other heretics come, who will not, like the Lutherans, deal with them; let them, without their thanks, give place to the same, let the same make us Lutherans pious; what is the matter?

028 But that they show causes why one form should be needed, namely, that there is as much under one form as under both; though I have otherwise written much against it, yet again I must show it to the blind guides. The question here is not whether there is as much or as little under one form? Such evasive speeches indicate that one shuns the light, and the truth is shy; but this is the question, here lies the knot, here one should stand and answer, namely: whether one must keep God's word or not? But God has established His word that both forms are right, and not one form. If all the leaves and grass, all the stars in the heavens and the grains of sand on the seashore cried out for eternity, saying, "There is as much under one form as under both," no heart will be satisfied, but the conscience overrules all this and says this with authority: Dear, thou tellest me much, that there is as much under one form as under both; yet God's word stands there, and commands me nevertheless to use both forms, and he knows without doubt better than you all, whether there is as much under one form as under both; nevertheless he commands to use both forms. What shall a poor conscience say against such a word, command, and order of God, since it does not help that under one form there is as much as under both?

029 For I reckon that under one form there is a thousand times more than under both; yea, if under both forms there be nothing, and under one form all things, what shall that profit me? Nevertheless God's word remains of both forms, and asketh nothing how much or little I reckon under one or both forms? And must a poor conscience say: Dear, there is nowhere so much under one form as under both, namely, under one form is only half the words of God or his command, but under both forms are the words of God both and whole. Dearly beloved, it is not true that the words of God are done out of sight, and because with God they are done out of mind.

How much there is under one or both of them. It is said: "He that is of God heareth the word of God" [John 8:47]. The word, the word (I say) must be regarded more than the whole sacrament with all that it is and can do. For it is in the word, and where it is to be divorced and eaten, let the whole sacrament pass away before leaving a few letters or tittle of the words. But now they ask nothing of the word of God, and in the meantime they seal up a whole sacrament in a half sacrament, for they are despisers of God, and blasphemers of his word!

(30) Whether the edict here almost says that no innovation is to be made here, even such wise men and blasphemers should take themselves by the nose, who reproach God's word for an innovation, although they know well that they lie here, as the public wicked. For they know that God's word of both forms is not an innovation, but has been established by Christ Himself, and has been kept obediently by the church for more than fifteen hundred years. But they themselves are the ones who have devised an innovation against the old and eternal Word of God, even the practice brought to all of Christendom up to this time, with their One Form; now go and baptize their new poems for an old thing, and the eternal Word of God together with the whole Christian Church obedience for an innovation, thereby not only disgracing the whole holy Christian Church, as an erroneous, damned whore, who did not keep the right old Word of God, but has adopted a heretical innovation, but also the eternal God himself as a liar and a fool, who has not before ordained his holy word of both forms by Christ in the Lord's Supper, but has lately performed it against her mad poetry. Well, blaspheme confidently, dear Pabstes, because you have time, it will soon be different! But no one can keep such edicts, except the children of the devil. God preserve all Christians for this!

(31) The other piece is about the mass. This laudable edict states that both the common mass and the special mass (they want to speak politely of the corner mass, and call them special masses, as if the church had two different masses or sacraments) should be held, together with

The chant, prayer, ceremonies, dress, and orders, as well as the inculcation and posture of the major and minor canons, are all kept as before, and no change or innovation is to be made in them. 2c. There you have it at once, what you should do and not do, without the word of the holy Cardinal Campegii, when he answered the emperor, and spoke of the corner masses: he wanted to let himself be torn to pieces before he wanted to let the mass go or change. For with this word, as with an inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the Mass would be confirmed, and at the same time our confession would be established by the holy Gospels, as they boast above. For how is it possible that the word of such a holy man should not be the holy gospel and the inspiration of the Holy Spirit? It should be considered as such, lest he be torn to pieces.

32. Now then, you hear for the second time that the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (which is the head and ground of this edict) is over the holy Gospels, and that our confession (which has condemned such a mass through the Gospels) has been transferred through the Gospels, as they boast above in the beginning; Not that such poets are to be esteemed drunk, for they have soberly made such an edict, but that they are mad and foolish (through God's wrath), and do not see how shamefully they lie against themselves, namely, that they boast of the Evangelia, so that they want to have our confession mislaid, and nevertheless act continually against the Evangelia, according to their saying, and shall continually be their spirit's saying Evangelia and over all Evangelia. But it must be so, that a liar must be a forgotten man, who cannot think how beginning and end rhyme together.

033 Therefore, since the intercession of the Holy Spirit and the holy Gospels (in order that our confession may be transferred and their mass confirmed) says that the mass should be kept in all respects as before, and that no change at all should be made, you may well think that in the holy Gospels both canons must be found, chasuble and chalice, plates and caps, hearing and howling; item, a

Sell the mass for six pence to the souls in purgatory, to the mariners on the sea, to the merchant in the country, to the sick in the house, and help everyone in all things with it, to court the angels and saints in heaven with it, and all in all, to make a treasure market and trade out of the mass, to feed and honor the belly with it, and neither speak nor hear anything about the faith or comfort of souls, just as has been done until now. These things, I say, must all be in the holy gospels. For they have laid our confession (which condemns such abominations) with the holy gospels, and confirmed such things. Yea, my brother, how thinkest thou of these masters? It is often said that eagles and lynxes see clearly; but they are blind as blind as a bat to these masters, who can see in the Gospels both the canons, the garments, and all sorts of masses. These may be called truly sharp doctors, who have sat higher than chickens.

(34) Now here you see that the desperate wretches and evil-doers are dealing with us out of sheer wickedness and spite, and are thus publicly and shamefully blaspheming the most reverend Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Lord; not only do they not want to atone for or do away with the unspeakable, innumerable, horrible abuses of the Mass, but they also want to confirm, defend, and increase them forever. O God from heaven! is this not too high and too much superiority? Wilt thou not also look upon it once? Does this not cry out to you from heaven? When did any sin ever cry out to heaven? Shall not those go unpunished who blaspheme thy name, how then do these most vile blasphemers go so freely? Shall not the Turk and all the plague have good fortune against us? If they should almost despair of sin, who hear and see such blasphemies as Lot in Sodoma [2 Pet. 2:8].

035 But it is sufficiently proved, and no pabst will overthrow it, that the mass is the word and sacrament of God, which he offereth and giveth unto us: for there are the bright and dry words, Jesus took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, This is my body which is given for you.

will be. Likewise also the cup" 2c. [Matth. 26,26.27. Marc. 14,22. Luc. 22,19. 1 Cor. 11, 23. ff.] In these words we remain, in these words we stand, in these words we want to live and die (if God wills), in these words the Mass is founded. Here you do not find that we should buy and sell the Sacrament or the Mass. Here you do not find that we offer or give anything to God with it. Here you do not find that we should honor the saints with it. Here you do not find that souls should be bought out of purgatory with it. Here you do not find that one may help another from sins and all kinds of distress through the mass, as both their blasphemous canons and their teachers do, and as they recently saw in the Gospels at the Imperial Diet in Augsburg, and learned by speaking. For before they found it in no gospel; but when they should have laid aside our confession, the gospels fully, fully, fully, and completely confessed it, and confirmed all these things.

036 But here we find Christ saying, Given for you for the remission of sins. Forgiveness of sins is here to be sought and found unto eternal life, and to remember the Lord Jesus Christ, and to preach his passion until he come. Neither say ye, Sacrifice, or give Me anything in the mass; but say thus, Take ye (not I), and eat ye (not I), and drink ye (not I). Here we are to receive and take, but he gives and bestows. Now if not only the two canons, but as many canons were against these words as raindrops upon the earth, and if every tabernacle and mule were more than a thousand Gabriels in heaven, and cried for ever sacrificial mass, sacrificial mass! what would all this be against such bright words of Christ? And as said above, if it were possible for all Christendom to keep the mass as such Pabstles would have it, what would it be? Christ's word must still stand, and be more valid than the church, for Christ's word is God's word; let all creatures give way to it and honor it, and not suffer it to be a false liar, as the wicked priests here blaspheme it.

37.                      and                      how                      they                      alone                      have                      this                      sacrament thus made a sacrifice of purchase? Why did they not also make baptism and all its seven sacraments a sacrifice? If the other sacraments are all gifts of God, which we do not give, but receive and accept, how is it then that this one sacrament, as a child of God, must not be equal to the others, and remain such a gift of God? Must this alone be concluded from the definition or nature of all sacraments? But what shall I dispute against the wanton blasphemers and impenitent Pabstles? It is as the bishop of Salzburg said: Oh, why do you want to reform us priests? We priests have never been good. Be not good, and stay not good, in the name of your god, the devil! How dare you reform us, who confess that we are good and right? Is it not enough that you are evil-doers and traitors to God, as you impudently boast of yourselves, but will you also force us righteous ones to be lost with you, and never to be good? These are not the words of human wickedness, but if the devil himself would speak most devilishly, how could he make it more devilish than this: We are not good, neither do we wish to be good, but neither will we let others be good nor remain good.

038 For the sake of brevity, I will leave undecided what more the edict says about confirmations and anointings, for it is nothing else, neither their sacred intercession nor the new sacred gospels, that they have moved our confession; which gospels they have now found in Augsburg in the smokehole or secret chamber, that is, they have invented and lied about in their false, lying hearts. For our evangelicals, who are known throughout the world, know nothing of their confirmations and anointings, but they must work and make sacraments where there are none; and where there are, they must make sacrifices and our work of them, lest they celebrate and go idle.

(39) The third piece is about free will. There they mumble about as if they had hot porridge in their mouths, without having to spit out their poison, and so it reads: "Because of free will, because the same error with its appendages is not human, but animal.

and is blasphemy, the same shall not be held, taught, nor preached" 2c. From this no one can know what error they condemn, whether it be those who hold no free will; or those who hold all free will; or those who hold half or a little of free will. For they themselves have never been one among themselves, nor will they ever be one as to what free will ought to be; they pick and bite themselves about it, like mad swine among themselves, and yet condemn the error of free will, and give no name to the error; wherefore we must measure such their judgment by their hearts, and not by their mouths. But their heart is ours; therefore their mouth will certainly mean our doctrine.

040 This again is a new art, which they have learned from the discourse and from the new gospels, namely, that they themselves know not what free will is, neither can they ever know it, nor become one; yet they boast and condemn the doctrine of free will. For if they were to teach me what free will is, they would certainly have to answer me thus: One teacher says this, the other that, and the higher schools are still divided about it. If I then asked further, which is the best teacher, they do not know either, but each follows and dares to follow his doctor. But in this they are nevertheless one, that they condemn our doctrine, even as Pilate and Herod, being whole among themselves, have become one concerning Christ. So here this edict teaches us to shun our doctrine, and instead to let them lead us on a monkey's tail; and the opinion is, Thou hast unrighteous doctrine, but we have not yet certain right doctrine. These are, by leave, great and coarse asses' heads, which condemn a thing, when they themselves confess that they neither know nor understand it. For who can know what is error in free will who does not yet know with certainty what free will is or is not?

041 This, indeed, is a very beastly, and not a human error, to condemn, and yet to confess that they know not what it is; and this much is said, What we know, we do not know.

1686 Erl. (2.) SS, 72-74. cap. 13. of the Diet of Augsburg 1530. w. xvi, 2043-2045. 1687.

Let it be right and wrong; let it be without art or understanding; the discourse and the new holy Gospels have taught us so at Augsburg. Just as if the highly learned and noble, wise cattle, the swine, decided at their imperial diet: We sows decree that no one shall think that muscats are noble spices, but what they are we know not; but we hold, some, that they are marc, some, that they are bran, some, that they are cabbage leaves, some, that they are the delicious peas under the fences. In the same way, our highly learned and enlightened pigs in Augsburg act wisely here, and for this reason they rebuke God's truth as a beastly and blasphemous thing.

042 Indeed, since they do not intend to do more at the Diet than to show us their will, and say: What we want shall be right and wrong, regardless of whether God's word teaches otherwise, they would have left the pious emperor at home and unconcerned; we had known it well before, that they set the virtue of the end-Christ against and above God, and all that is called God, and is honored for God [2 Thess. 2:4]. But it is all according to the bishop's word in Salzburg: "The priests are not good," and according to Campeggi's counsel, who will let himself be torn to pieces before he will be good, and accept the known truth. Nor do I blame them if they do evil because they do not want to be good, just as little as I blame a thorn bush for pricking; I would blame a fig tree if it bore thorns, and I would blame the pope and his clergy if they once did something really good. Let the knaves go.

(43) Our doctrine, that free will is dead and of no use, is powerfully grounded in Scripture; I speak of free will against God and in the affairs of souls. For what shall I dispute much about free will, which rules over cows and horses, over money and goods? I almost know that Gen. 1, 26.ff. God gave man dominion over cattle and over the earth. Such things do not belong here. If it were not for the saying of St. Paul 2 Timothy 2:26, "They are the captives of the devil according to his own will," we would have scripture and reason enough.

To be captives of the devil is truly no freedom, and especially because they are so captive that they must live according to his will; so free will must certainly be the devil's will, for they must live according to it, as his captives. This is clearly the teaching of St. Paul, and Christ himself agrees with it, Luc. 11:21, 22, when he says: "If the strong man keep his court, his own remains in peace; but if a stronger man come upon him," 2c. Here Christ himself testifies that the devil possesses his own with peace, unless the stronger comes over him.

(44) By this saying we remain; for otherwise it is sufficiently and abundantly written, that we have the deed and the work itself also for us, namely, that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, by his own blood redeemed us from the devil, death, and sins [Acts 20:28, Heb. 9:12]. Now if there had been a free will in us, against or over the devil, death, and sin, he should not have died for us; and he that can escape sin without Christ, can also escape death, "For death is the punishment of sins," Rom, 6, 23. But no man has yet been found to prove his free will over and against death, but death has again proved its free will and power over all men, which it could not do unless sin (which is the right and power of death) had first overpowered and imprisoned man. By this deed and article of faith in Christ we abide, and let the papists' plea and the new gospel remain a pestilence. No one will convince us that Christ has redeemed us from the devil, death, and sins. Where this remains, there remains no other free will than that which is captive to the devil, death, and sin. If this is a freedom, let it be that of those who make their words new evangels, contrary to the right old evangels.

(45) The fourth part is about the main article of the Christian faith, namely, that faith alone without works makes one righteous. They speak of this in the Edict: "And since it is evident from the Scriptures that faith alone, without love and good works, does not make one righteous, and since God requires good works in many places in the Scriptures, the article says that faith alone does not make one righteous."

That faith alone justifies, and good works are rejected, is not preached nor taught. What they say here of not rejecting good works, they speak maliciously again with blind words, to revile us with it, as if we rejected good works, when they well know otherwise, that we do more in good works than the whole papacy ever did, which also never understood any good work, as is otherwise sufficiently proved; nor can they leave off their poisonous lies and blasphemies. And in Summa Summarum, there is not a word in this edict, it has the gloss in it: Priests have never been good. The word transfigures all the letters of this edict.

046 And what should such sowers understand in this high and holy article of good, if they cannot bear the lower articles, but that a man may have a wife, a wife may have a husband in marriage; a man may eat and drink what God giveth him and maketh him; a Christian may enjoy both forms of the sacrament, and the like much more. It would be a pity that such mad cattle and foul swine should smell these muscats, let alone eat and enjoy them. Let them teach and believe that he that letteth a forz in the chancel is a mortal sin, and he that soapeth over the altar is a reprobate. Or, that I may also come to their high articles; he that washes his mouth with water, and swallows a drop, may not say mass that day; he that forgets his mouth open, that a mosquito may fly into his throat, may not receive the sacrament that day; and such innumerable, glorious, excellent, high articles, on which their secular church is founded. These are articles worth speaking of; what should they esteem great faith and good works, such low, bad, silly things?

(47) But because I see that the devil must always blaspheme this principal article through the pillars, and cannot rest nor cease, I, Doctor Martinus Luther, an evangelist unworthy of our Lord Jesus Christ, say that this article: "All faith, without all works, makes one righteous in the sight of God," shall be left standing and remain the Roman emperor, the Turkish emperor, the doddering emperor, the Persian emperor, the pope, all cardinals, bishops, priests, monks, Nuns, kings, princes, lords, all the world together with all devils, and shall have hellish fire on their heads, and no thanksgiving. This is my, Doctor Luther's, speaking of the Holy Spirit, and the true holy gospel.

(48) For there is the article which the children pray, I believe in Jesus Christ crucified and dead; 2c. There is no one who died for our sins, but JEsus Christ, the Son of God. JEsus the Son of God alone, again I say, JEsus the Son of God alone has redeemed us from sins, this is certainly true, and all Scripture; and if all the devils and the world should rend and burst, it is true. But if it be he alone that taketh away sins, we cannot be he by our works: for it is impossible that I should take hold of and obtain such a one and only Saviour from sins, Jesus, otherwise than by faith: by works he is and remaineth ungrasped. But since faith alone, before and before works, takes hold of such a redeemer, it must be true that faith alone, before and without works, takes hold of such redemption; which can be nothing else than being justified. For to be redeemed from sins, or to have sins forgiven, must be no other than to be or become justified 2c. But after such faith, or redemption received, or sins forgiven, or righteousness, then follow good works, as such fruits of faith. This is our doctrine, and so teacheth the Holy Ghost, and all holy Christendom, that we abide in God's name, Amen.

49 Then there is an addition in the edict. There they set forth several articles concerning benefices, priestly marriages, the same repentance and conversion, their punishment, lewd wives of the priests, and the examination of preachers by the ordinaries. 1) It is offered to them by ours at Augsburg, and I in my exhortation to them have also des-

1) Here in Luther's autograph is the following addition, which he himself, however, deleted: "who look at me as if it were Duke Georgen of Saxony's wisdom, for he always has such finns in his nose, to whom, if God grants me life and health, I will once answer from his preface to the New Testament and other vicious writings, and then also touch these crickets of his head".

I have also offered to gladly accept their ecclesiastical authority, or, as they call it, jurisdiction, 1) as long as they let the gospel go, and stop the abuses, which they themselves know to be abominable abuses, and they are obligated not only to let the gospel go freely, but also to preach it themselves, and to leave life and limb over it; Then the benefices could be well dealt with, and capable pastors appointed, and all things would have been well to help and advise. Yes, that they should yield to this, let alone do it themselves. They want to have their ecclesiastical authority to confirm their abuses, and to dampen the gospel, and to murder, burn, drown, execute, and chase away devout Christians over it. This is called spiritual supremacy, and relies on men's power, which cannot fail, for men cannot die; so also God cannot hinder nor control any man; therefore they certainly have it, as it is written, Ps. 33:16, "A king is not helped that he is mighty." Item: "A strong man cannot stand by fine strength." These sayings are a lie to them now; therefore they must surely succeed in everything.

050 Then follows an article, that priests shall not be suffered to dwell in dishonest lives, or with dishonest wives. Truly, here they attack things with seriousness. Fie, fie, how will it be that they also attack themselves so severely; this will certainly be one of the main sayings of the right discourse, and of the new gospels. But these are dark words, and may be of three kinds. The first is that the priests should have no whores of their own with them, for these are dishonest women, but should go to the lords, citizens, and peasants for wives and daughters, these are honest women; as that old buffoon meant and said: We priests are become fools; when I was young, we slept with the citizens at their wives and daughters, then the wives became pleasant to us, and the men also had to become pleasant to us, if they should have thunder; but now every man wants to have a whore of his own, the wives are to us

1) See Col.982, supra, § 77 et seq.

Therefore we are of no account with men. This is the right and best mind of this article.

051 The second is, that the priests should live wickedly without wives; this is a papal and cardinal mind, that they should live without wives, as Daniel hath declared, [Cap. 11:37] and the example is before their eyes in the most holy chastity, learned out of Sodoma and Gomorrah; which mind the article may well suffer, yea, I respect their Holy Ghost's intercession meaneth the same especially. The third is that the priests should live chastely in all things, like the angels in heaven. This understanding is not their earnestness, but a mirror fencing; for they themselves know well that they cannot have so many healers as to cut off all the priests. So it is in the day, that there are few priests who can live chastely where they are not cut, though they would gladly do so. And so it is that the bishops suffer harm in the kitchen, where the poor priests should not give whore money and milk money. Summa, there are desperate boys in the skin that they make such an article, since they know well that it cannot be raised, and the bishops themselves and canons do not want to nor can they stop their shameful public whoring, and are the greatest whore hunters on earth, which no one can witness, they do it impudently before all the world, and want to force other people to chastity. Oh, what a fine thing it is when a bishop is an arch-whore hunter, and calls a poor priest to live chastely.

52) But the most serious thing is that with this they take God in the mouth and forbid marriage, which God created, as St. Paul says in 1 Timothy 4:3, that such commandments are the doctrine of the devil, as they well know; nevertheless, they refrain from curbing God's work, creature, will and word; they pretend that the priests must keep their vow, which they made in their consecration. This vow must be the cover of shame, under which one blasphemes and desecrates God in his word and works, and also cancels and denies the first and highest vow, since we have vowed. Let him be our God, and let us honor and praise his word and work above all things. Whereas no vow shall be valid that dishonors or disgraces his word and work, as this vow of celibacy (which is impossible to keep) does.

1692 Erl. (2.) L5,78-80. sect. 11. the other imperial decree. No. 1157. w. LVI, 2VS0-S0S3. 1693
Marriage blasphemeth and profaneth, both with blasphemous forbiddings, and with profane whoredoms and bitches.
But no one listens, they want to know.

(53) Further, they command that one should not preach that one wants to suppress or destroy the holy gospel and the word of God. That would be a piece of wisdom for once, since a sober word has escaped from the drunkard. Truly it is wise to say that they should not be called destroyers of the gospel. For they are not, but only act as if they wanted to destroy it. That they are not, however, is not lacking in good will, as the deed shows before the eyes, but in the power that God does not want to burden them with. Now let us command God to judge whether he will judge them to be destroyers and oppressors of his word, who would gladly destroy and oppress it with persecution, murder, and burning with all their hearts. I will not call them destroyers or oppressors of God's word, and the devil will be grateful to them for leaving it undestroyed and unsuppressed; they, like Caiphas, have prophesied about themselves that they will not destroy or oppress God's word, amen.

(54) They say that the Gospel is to be taught according to the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures and teachers who are approved by the common holy Christian church. Here they come and bring him, the good journeyman! Dear, where do we find the Gospel interpreted according to the Scriptures? Are we drunk here, or do we dream such things? And what are the teachers approved by the common Christian church? It may be D. Eck, D. Schmid, and D. Rotzlöffel, otherwise I know of none who are approved by the common Christian church. For St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, and similar writings are unknown in other churches, except the Latin Church. Nor would I advise the pope himself that the Evangelia should be taught according to St. Augustine, Ambrose, Hierouymi, Gregory, Hilari, 2c. Interpretation, the devil should throw him, and was not long to be pope! Neither will the pope do it, but will be judge and master over all the teachers, and over the Gospels and the Holy Scriptures, and he will not be a pope for long. alone must be heard. Moreover, this edict has itself praised the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and the new gospels, so that they have made the confession of ours. What is the use of such a jiggery-pokery and such a lie? They smear our mouths as if they wanted to teach the Gospels according to the interpretation of the Scriptures; and yet their opinion is no different than to teach according to their own inspiration and according to the Pope's conceit. Such things must be called holy scripture, as we have heard above of both forms and other things.

55 Because the pope cannot nor will suffer this article, and also rejects this imperial edict himself and respects nothing, we would certainly be excused if we did not keep it either. But we would gladly keep it, if they would let us, which they do command; that is so much to say: They are grossly shameful Pabstists and liars, who themselves do not see what they say, and how their lies always disgrace themselves; and nevertheless command to keep such things for holy scripture and articles of faith. We will abide by this rule, which St. Paul teaches us Rom. 12:7: "Let all prophecy be made like unto faith." Now whichever teachers teach in this way, that is according to the faith of Christ, let us teach and keep them. But whosoever teacheth not according to faith, we will neither hear him, nor see him, whether he be pope, or emperor, or devil, or his mother. For we are baptized into Christ, that we should believe the good word; and we are not baptized into teachers, or into popes, or into churches. We cannot lack St. Paul's rule, but how the teachers meet in many things is sufficient for the day.

56 Then they commanded that the preachers should teach that the commanded feasts should be kept, that the forbidden food should be avoided, and that the religious should keep their vows, and not reject them. First of all they said that the gospel should be taught according to the interpretation of the holy Scriptures. Hereupon they commanded, To keep feasts, fasts, plates, and caps. Why? because they found it in the Gospel, which should be taught according to the interpretation of the Scriptures. They see so exceedingly clearly that they also find feasts, fasts, plates, and caps in the Gospel. But they soon have their glosses

For they have found their own conversation, and that which they think to be right is called the gospel. Therefore they can easily see this in it, even if they are dreaming or drunk. How shamefully do such loose, careless liars listen! God blinds them, so that they cannot speak a word, lest they smite themselves in the cheeks and betray. I could never so shamefully reproach them nor disgrace them as they disgrace themselves with this wretched dictum of lies.

57 And the sum is: one should not accept any innovation in the way of the church, at the penalty of life, limb, and property. God protect us here, they also want to take your life, if you do not use consecrated salt and water and the like 2c. But how finely the devil paints himself in this edict, and seals up his art, so that one should notice that he has been there. He is a liar and a murderer, saith Christ Joh. 8, 44; and this edict, his controfait, image, and similar fruit, must also confirm it. For in the beginning, as the true children of the devil, they put forward their lies (that is, the lies of the wicked devil) for new evangelization, and they pushed them through the whole edict. Here at the end they want to murder and kill all those who do not want to keep their lies. So the beginning and end of this edict fit together so well that one must assume that the liar and murderer, the devil, has fed it out of his own mouth, or rather thrown it out of his butt. Fie on the shame in German lands, that one should kill a man for the sake of a small ceremony, which they themselves neither keep nor want to keep! How much God has been praised and defied! If any man would rather be a Turk than a disciple of such desperate wretches and blasphemers. Well, well, grow up well, dear liars and murderers, God will send one who shall shake the tree.

58. at the end they command that the monks and monastic estates be restored and reinstated 2c. Take care, take care, dear nobles, of yourselves. If this commandment should be your earnestness, since the great holy God Mammon is for, where would the Cardinal of Mainz remain, who robbed two monasteries at Halle, and demolished two parish churches, and plays with ecclesiastical persons and goods like a juggler? Where will King Ferdinand, the Dukes of Bavaria, Duke George, and other papal princes remain, who are treasuring ecclesiastical persons and goods, and are fighting so that their rinds crack; which is all against the holy ecclesiastical law, that they are patrons against the Lutherans? Yes, where will the holy father pope and cardinals be, who in Rome have purged out many monasteries, where about one and a half hundred persons live inside, so purely that two lost monks, or a loose knave, sit inside for six ducats a year and sell mass? or do they think that one does not know what the monasteries are called, or from where the cardinals get their interest? It is said, Brother Hans, take thyself by the nose, and first pluck the beam out of thine eye. But the consensus and the new evangelia have soon judged here that such robbery and fighting is the teaching of the gospel, according to the interpretation of the holy scriptures; there it lies!

59. They themselves know and feel that the papal princes enjoy four times more of the spiritual goods, and steal and rob many more of them, than the Lutherans; nor are they so insolent that they think all the world has lost all five senses, that they can neither see nor feel; they want to be the guardians of the clergy, so that no one hurts the clergy so much as the very same guardians; they will also do it the longer the better, until the clergy learn what is said: "It is good to trust in the Lord, and not in men" [Ps. 118, 8. 9.]. It serves them right, and I have to laugh in my fist when I see how they fall away from God and rely on men.

(60) I have often advised that the spiritual goods should be used to maintain parishes and schools, and to support poor students; item, to provide for the visitation and other needs of parishes and churches; item, to counsel poor virgins and children; what is left after that should be used for common benefit and for poor or needy people. But the greater part of such goods is so cursed and shamefully obtained by all manner of blasphemy and abuse, that it is not worthy to come into good use. And because the pope together with all the foundations and

If the monasteries (as the thieves and peelers) so horribly get hold of such goods as are not theirs, so shamefully whore them away, spend them, and squander them, and do no office for them, I also do not esteem it great, whether it be torn by others; it belongs to the devil, as St. Michaeas Cap. 1, 7. says: "It is acquired with whoredom; with whoredom it must also be consumed."

(61) This also serves, because the mouths of the Popes cannot rest; they seek, ponder, and write, that they may say something evil of us, and even if they lie most impudently; they look us up and down, but always find too much good in us, which they cannot punish with truth. So I let them wash and wash their mouths with this filth; they must wash their mouths with us, so it is even more this piece; it is better this than another. There is so much good in our country that such goods are nothing compared to it; let the pabst's mouths blow it out as high as they can, but I hope that it will still do well with our people, as much as it is worth that it will do well.

022 But I wonder why they have not put in the edict many other and great articles more, than of the brotherhoods, which also are not a number, since every saint, and every craft, hath a peculiar brotherhood. Item, of indulgences and golden years, which are considerably lacking. Item: Pilgrimages to Rome, Mary of Loreto, St. James, Jerusalem, and many countless places more. Item, of purgatory; item, the special supreme article of the papacy and supreme power of the church (I should say, of the pope). Item, that no monk shall walk, sit, or lie down without a chasuble. Item, that priests shall have plates and long skirts. Item, that they should read their horas canonicas to the least, where they do not want to pray. Item, of the false key and the key of meeting. That a bishop must buy his episcopal mantle from the pope for 3, 6, 8, 10, 20, 30 thousand florins, and yet it is not a simonei. Item, that the pope is emperor, and over the emperor, even in the secular government, as c. Lolitas and c. Pastoralis 1) teach us.

1) Decret. Oroc. lib. I, tit. 33. c. 6, and Idiü. lib. I, tit. 29. e. 28. (Erl. ed.)

Item, that with holy water and holy salt 2) sins are blotted out, and the devil is cast out; I will be silent about many other articles that are not so excellent and necessary. These, however, should be considered as the article of one form, or of free will, for the Lutherans have caused great heresy in all of these.

(63) But I think that they, as wise men, have some articles, and not all of them, to tell as an example, in which they also include all others, and want them to be understood under them. That this is their opinion is evident from the fact that they do everything by their own words and new gospels, and nothing according to God's word and the old true gospels. Since in the Edict they call only the articles of the Word, it is easy to suppose that they mean all the articles that come from the Word. Now, they all come from the Word of God, where else should they come from, since no Word of God or Scripture teaches the same? On the other hand, it is evident that they say that no innovation should be made. In these words it is clearly expressed that everything should remain as before, and nothing should be changed. Therefore, all other unnamed articles are certainly included here, even those which they themselves confess to be blasphemous and shameful abuses and errors, the obvious lies and cheating with indulgences, sanctuary, pilgrimages, and the like.

044 Well, there you have the desperate, obstinate enemies of God and blasphemers, who may command us not only to err, lie, and deceive, but also to consider such errors, lies, and deceitfulness as right and good, which is most grievously sinned against in the Holy Spirit. For what is it said, ye shall not innovate, but this much: before ye should change or innovate any thing, how it is false and unjust (as we well know), rather hold it to be right and good, and rather blaspheme God day and night in heaven, than that ye should innovate? Such a decree should justly have such an edict, and was none better.

that it might so brazenly foam its own shame before all the world, that even the stones and wood might feel and know how God has blinded and defiled them, that they are always punished with one blindness and sin above another, as the 69th Psalm, v. 29, says: "Let them fall into one sin above another, and not come to thy righteousness"; and Ps. 109:6: "Set ungodly teachers over them, and let Satan stand at their right hand." That's right, that's the way they want it. Corporal punishment is too small; but that they should be punished with sins and blindness, and gain pleasure in blaspheming the Holy Spirit, they are worthy of it; so shall God deal with such wicked men.

(65) Whether some here would gladly pretend to be pious, and pretend that by the forbidden innovation are meant not the errors and deceptions, but the proper and correct ceremonies and doctrines: Dear, this gloss does not exist, since the edict lies in the day, in which all the Lutheran articles are condemned, and not one papal article. That some would be moved to the sign, since the monks have consoled the Christian souls, so acquired by Christ's blood, in death with their cap and holy order, that they should be saved by such a garment and the order's merit. No, no, there is no error to be confessed, atoned for, or corrected, but only our articles, which they know to be not ours, but of the Holy Scriptures, and have nothing against them but their old custom. Therefore, because they do not name any papal article, and forbid all renewal on it, they thereby give room and authority to all preachers to keep all errors and lies, and do not allow one to be changed. Hui tuest, eoussutire viæetur. Who wants to make an error known, if the edict does not make one known, and so strictly rejects all innovation? They are vain arch-robbers, in all their words and works, into which they must fall by the wrath of God.

66 Although I know of some fools among bishops and princes who confess that there is much error in the papacy, yet they contend that it behooves Luther not to change, as the Cardinal of Salzburg had also said that he might well suffer our doctrine, but that he would not change it.

to be reformed from the corner, that is not to be tolerated. Therefore, if they had condemned Luther before, they would then come and do what Luther does, so that they would have the honor and glory of having done such a great work of reformation. The great, coarse fools do not realize that they herewith clearly indicate how they do not seek God's praise and glory, but their own glory and honor in such undertakings. Awe, yes, the Holy Spirit is gladly with them, and God is glad to give them great happiness! For where they sought God's glory and honor, they would not ask much from what corner or person good came, but would say thus: Is it right, why does one not do it: Fiat justitia, et pereat mundus. As also St. Paul 1 Cor. 14, 30. gives, that where it is revealed to another than the chief teacher, let the chief teacher hold his peace, and follow. Yes, beloved, yes, God's Word will let itself be called God's Word, or not God's Word, according to the person, that where the person is great, it should be God's Word, where not, it should not be God's Word. But fools are fools, and can do nothing but fool [Proverbs 27:22].

67 If God doth not require thee to do a work, who art thou a fool to undertake it? In the Book of Maccabees, Cap. 5, 56 ff., we read that Joseph and Asariah also wanted to do honor with wars against the Gentiles, but they were not commanded to do so, and were smitten with them. Upon this the text [v. 62.] saith, "They were not the men to help Israel." To a good work belongeth a certain divine calling, and not one's own devotion, which is called: oaky counsels. 1) It becomes sour for those who have a certain calling from God to start and accomplish something good, even though God is with them and with them. What then should the senseless fools do, who want to go up without a calling, seeking their own vain honor and glory? Just as it is not otherwise possible for anyone who undertakes something without God's calling to seek his own honor and glory, for he is God himself.

They know for themselves what is to be done, and have no need of God and his word. That is why they are so blessed, and why their plans proceed as the crab does, as one sees before his eyes and learns every day.

68 But I, Doctor Martinus, was called and compelled to this, that I had to become a doctor without my thanks, out of pure obedience; so I had to accept the office of doctor, and swear and vow to my most beloved holy scripture to preach and teach it faithfully and purely. Over such teaching the papacy has fallen in my way, and has tried to prevent it; it has also come upon him, as before his eyes, and shall come upon him still worse, and shall not resist me. I will walk in God's name and calling upon the lion and the viper, and tread under foot the young lion and the dragon; and this shall begin at my life, and be accomplished after my death. St. John Hus prophesied about me when he wrote from prison in Bohemia: "They will roast a goose now (for Hus is called a goose); but for a hundred years they will hear a swan singing, and they shall suffer it, and it shall remain so, whether God wills it.

69 This is what I want to have said about this edict as a gloss. If I am alive and someone is treating me, I can still itch and scratch a lot. But let no one be afraid of this edict, which they so shamefully lie about and omit under the pious emperor's name. Should they not let out their lies under the name of a pious emperor, when they have begun and maintained their whole blasphemous, shameful nature, status, doctrine, life, and what they are and do, all under the name of God and the holy church, now more than six hundred years ago? But the same our dear God wanted to put an end to such blasphemy one day, and to sanctify his name again, so that his kingdom would also come one day, and his will be done, amen, amen. And let the blasphemous ministry and all that is attached to it fall into the abyss of hell, as John proclaims in Apocalypsi [Revelation 14:8, 18:2, 22:20], amen; say whoever wants to be a Christian, amen.

1158. D. Martin Luther's writing "against the assassin at Dresden", written to save the "Warning to his dear Germans".

Towards the end of April 1531. 1)

As an introduction to this writing, one should read what we have included in the 19th volume of our edition in the introduction, p. 22d f. We have spoken about the expression "Meuchler" in No. 25, Note 2, in the appendix to the 19th volume, Col. 1822 ff. The first printing appeared under the title: "Widder den Meuchler zu Dresen gedruckt. Wart. Luther. Wittenberg. 1531." At the end: "Gedruckt zu Wittenberg Durch Hans Lufft. M.D.XXX I." 4 sheets in quarto. In the same year there is another edition, in which the printing errors of the first are corrected. Further, an edition, though under Lufft's name, but still a reprint, with the date 1531, and finally a Low German, without indication of the place (at Magdeburg, Mich. Lotther). In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 4596; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 303; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 559; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 336; in the Erlangen (1st), vol. 25, p. 89, and in the second edition, vol. 25, p. 108. After the latter we give the text.

The papists have now let a book of shame go out against me at this Leipzig 2) market. And although they have hitherto cried out splendidly against the books of shame, so that before great respectability and virtue they have also called the books books of shame, since the names of the poets were printed on them, it is even vain virtue with such people. But this little book has no name, and is printed in Dresden, where there should be no boys' school, as in Wittenberg, and a village priest in Cöllen near Meissen must praise and extol it. What shall I say? If the papists would do otherwise, they would not be papists; they should do all kinds of the highest knavery, and yet be called good; what other people do in the very best, that should be called the worst. But all this serves me that my next two books may be confirmed and proved by this, that one must take hold of how I have spoken the truth, and have not lied about what I have written of the papists.

1) The following is to be noted about this time determination: According to the first words of this writing and what is said K 50, the same is written during the Leipzig Fair. In 1531, Easter was on April 9, and the Easter Fair was therefore from April 24 to May 13. On May 8, she was already in Dresden, as Luther reports in No. 1163 of this volume to Brück.

(2) Come, it is indeed artificially concealed, that must not be said; no one shall know where it comes from. I don't want to know it either, but want to have the snuff this time, and not smell the bachante; nevertheless, I will try my art, and hit the sack: If I hit the ass with it, so that he feels it, I will not have hit him, but only the sack; and as I said before, I will attack no papist alone, but all of them, be it one or many, who attack me; what one does, they shall all have done to me, and I will set before their noses their papist virtue, committed in this little book.

The first is (as said) that the poet of this booklet, the dear layman, 1) conceals his name, and yet brings it to the priest at Cöllen, who also does not name him.

(4) The other, that in the title and in the beginning he disgracefully blasphemes me and my book, as if I had taught that one should not be obedient to the emperor, when the insolent villain knows otherwise, and my book convinces him otherwise before his eyes. So now almost all the world knows that no one has written so splendidly of the emperor and obedience as I have; and what the papists know of it they have from me, before they knew nothing of it; but (as I said) my books must be proved right with such perfidies; and they, the papists, if I could not reproach them enough, must reproach and disgrace themselves with the deed, and call out their own name like the cuckoo.

5th The third, that he reproacheth me seditiously, and as he that would make the Germans disparaging to the emperor, and contrary to all authority 2c. This he denies as an arch-villain, and as a true pope; and if he is worthy of honour, or has a good drop of blood in his body, let him stand up freely, and prove the same. There are my books in the daytime, marked with my name, which shall cheerfully stand before the nose of this scribbler and assassin, and thus say: If emperor or sovereignty wants to oppose God and justice, then no one shall be obedient to them, especially who knows such things.

1) Duke George of Saxony, the author of the "Counterwarning of an Impartial Layman." That's what the villain wants to make me believe, that I have completely disobeyed the emperor and the authorities. So I hear well, St. Moritz and the holy ten thousand knights (as they are called) must also be rebellious, rebellious, and eternally damned, that they have thrown away their weapons, and do not want to obey the emperor to fight against the Christians; And every subject, if his mad fool (I would say, prince) would be against God, and would have justice, must also be disobedient, rebellious, and contumacious, if he would not be obedient, and help to shed innocent blood.

(6) Then see, my dear reader, whether Luther has lied in his two little books, since he has scolded the papists as traitors, murderers, evil-doers, and, alas! not enough. This villain wants to teach us the virtue of the papists, namely, that the subjects should not disobey where the authorities want to shed innocent blood against God and justice. For Luther wrote of the same tyrants, and not of the authorities, who have right good things, as the books lie there and testify. Nor does he write against it, and wants to defend the obedience of such tyrants. Where authority is right, he himself knows well, the fearful villain, what Luther writes of obedience. No, fellow, you shall not adorn or cover your murderous, treacherous tyranny with the name of rebellion or disobedience. 2) I have well kept my little book in the play, and put a stake in front of it for all blasphemers, so that whoever opposes it shall run up honestly, like this assassin.

(7) The fourth is when he shows how the Lutherans are preparing themselves with orders, with conspiring and alliances, which does not happen with the emperor and his own, but the emperor, as the most kind and gentle lord, has always acted to settle the matters amicably and peacefully 2c. Of the dear Emperor Carol I consider it certain that [it] is so; I also know well that his imperial majesty has been kinder and gentler at Augsburg, and still is, than the bloodthirsty tyrants and priests would like, and they have become almost mad with malice, that his imperial majesty has acted in such a way that he is able to keep the peace.

Majesty did not want to be a bloodhound with them. But the fact that this villain goes on to say that the others are also like this, he denies as an arch-villain: for, as has now been said, they are almost mad with malice, since the pious emperor does not want to rage with them; this is clear in the day, as we will hear hereafter.

(8) But that the Lutherans should arm themselves and assemble, that is not my business; I have neither told them to do so, nor advised them, nor do I know what they do or do not do. But because the papists indicate by this assassin that they believe the Lutherans to be in armament and order, I am glad to hear it from the heart, and I am glad that they are under such delusion and worry, and must believe that such Lutheran pretensions are true. And if I could, I would gladly help to strengthen such delusion and anxiety in them, until they should fear to death, and would sing of them such a song: "Squire Cain, if thou canst slay thy brother Habet, have also thy reward, that thou must tremble and fear that whoever meets thee may slay thee, and never be safe, and even a rustling leaf must frighten thee. If Annas and Caiphas can persecute Christ, they also have their reward, that they may be afraid of the people, saying, Awe, Awe, lest there be a tumult among the people [Matt. 26:5].

009 So also our murderers, who have shed so much innocent blood, and would willingly shed it, shall have the plague, that they shall be anxious and fearful lest there be a riot; and though the Lutherans be not armed, yet shall they be anxious lest Germany be full of armed Lutherans, and think not otherwise than that this year no tree shall bear leaves, but instead all Lutheran cuirassers and riflemen; this shall they have. So I have asked and still pray, as it is written, MZit iwpius N6wiu6 psrseyueuts, that they may be frightened and despondent at their own thoughts. Rather, yea, ye ought to be murdered, and to say, Mercy-juniors, ye are right, ye must not fear; he that helpeth you not is seditious. Yes, you ought to be ordered to do it!

010 Now if it were true that the Lutherans were arming themselves, who told thee that they do it against you murderers and papists? Or who gave you, a thief of God, the divine power to judge other people's hearts and minds? Are there not enough perilous times now, that need honest, lasting armor in all places? But thou doest right, and speakest as a pope should speak. Now I also suppose that such armor should apply against you murderers and traitors, so I still say, as I said, where they do it, in the opinion that they defend themselves against the bloodhounds, who want to shed innocent blood against God and right, then I will not let them rebelliously rebuke. Thus it is written in my books, and thou writest against the wicked, and wouldest that such bloodhounds should be free; and whosoever resisteth, I will reproach him seditiously: thou shalt not persuade me. Thou knowest that I speak of bloodthirsty tyrants, and not of the authorities, which have right things: thou hast sent my words thither, as a poisonous wicked man.

(11) The fifth, that he reproacheth me, that I do lie, even as (1) it were true that the Papists would war against the Lutherans, and as he said above, that the Emperor and his own do no such thing (2c). Here I say, where the assassin does not know how things stand, and stood at Augsburg, I have never seen a greater, coarser fool, who may write of unknowable things so exceedingly, and should call him fairly, not Norou Norotatou, but sspties Uorian. 2) But if he knows it, he is next to the pope the greatest villain on earth, and should be called the pope himself. I will indicate the causes of my poetry, so that everyone can see whether I have invented it or whether the assassin is right.

First, as I also reported in my booklet, it was decided at Bononia 3) that the emperor should suppress the Lutherans with the sword. They cannot deny this, and it is not my poem, but was publicly spoken and heard at Augsburg.

013 Item, it is evident, and not mine.

1) "equal sam" == equal as. Thus the Jena edition correctly separates the words. In the Wittenberg and in the Erlangen: "gleichsam".

2) Siebe St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1823, note 2.

3) Compare St. Louis edition, Vol. I V, 1417, 818.

poem that they have killed, burned, drowned, and shamefully murdered many individual persons, and still do so. From this everyone must conclude how they intend to suppress the Lutherans by force, wherever they can. And they made no secret of it; they also asked and urged the emperor to do so. But since the Lutheran princes are not single persons, it is to be expected that they will have to be subdued by war. The executioner in Leipzig will not behead the Elector of Saxony. The executioner of Mainz will not behead the landgrave either, and so on.

014 For when our brethren delivered their confession at Augsburg, one pope said, Oh, they deliver up a book written with ink; I would they would write them another with blood: to which another answered: Yea, if ye would write thus, ye must take heed lest the presilies be sprinkled under your eyes. I did not invent such a thing.

Item 15, D. Eck said: Ah, if the emperor in his entry into Germany had swiftly struck with the sword, as it was decided at Bononia! That's not my poem either.

016 Item, the bishop of Salzburg hath spoken with Master Philipps, and hath said, I have often considered these things, and have seen four ways or means, which cannot be more. The first way, that we should follow you Lutherans and turn aside; we will not do that. The second, that you Lutherans yield to us; this you cannot do (as you say). The third, transactio, that we may use reasonable means, and that a union may take place on both sides. This is not possible. For since the doctrines on both sides are contrary to one another, there can be no peace nor true unity. Therefore the fourth is that each part should think how it will outdo the other part. If this is not said of the will to war, I do not know what can be said of wars.

017 But I would have known another way, which should have been the fifth, that Christ should sit down at the right hand of God, and make his enemies his footstool [Ps. 110:11. But so they must lead out, and confess that they will not. They suffer the word of God, and think only to murder and to take, that they may know what they are worth, and what they ought to be counted for. The same bishop also said: What conscientia, what conscientia! the emperor will not suffer such separation.

018 Item, the Elector of Brandenburg and Duke George of Saxony are said (I believe I have heard) to have promised the Emperor that they will help him against the Lutherans with five thousand horses.

019 Item, the priests shall have promised immeasurable money for it.

020 For without my writing there was such rejoicing, and rejoicing, and rejoicing, among all the priests, in two years, that the earth was filled with it. How they have defied the emperor! how they have sung: Salvator vonit, Salvator vonit! Many bet that the Lutherans would all be defeated around Michaelmas; in the same way, great lords and earls boasted, and some of them were soon slain by the drip.

(21) Item, at Augsburg nothing else was said by the papists during the whole Diet, except: Where do you Lutherans want to stay? Where do you want to go? Do you not see the great power of the emperor? Do you not see his great fortune? Know ye not that the King of France is with us? And there has been neither measure nor end to the oppression and defiance, and I have not invented anything at that time.

22 Item, the Elector of Brandenburg said in his farewell: the Emperor and the Empire wanted to put body, blood and goods, land and people on it.

023 Item, I have heard of great men of truth, that on the side of the Papists the fierce tyrants have walked and sat with their faces downcast, and could not be seen otherwise than as if the hangman had hanged them three days, that it might be seen in them what malice, murder, and misery they had in mind. Just as Cain the villain hanged his head, and hid his face, because he was about to slay his brotherabel [Gen. 4:5, 6]. So this mortal...

1708 Erl. (2.) 28, 116-118. sect. 11. the other imperial decree. No. 1158. w. xvi, 2071-2073. 1709

When they had resolved on war and murder, they could no longer look at anyone because of the unrest and evil thoughts of their hearts.

(24) I will now hold my peace concerning what more the bishop of Salzburg said. I will also be silent now as to how things stood when the Landgrave of Hesse rode from the Diet.

25 Item, D. Schmid, the future bishop of Constantinople (salvo jure Turei), has publicly said before the empire: it is true that a concilium should be made, for there are many infirmities and abuses in the church; but nevertheless the emperor should restrain the Lutherans beforehand, so that it should not have to be said that they had to reform for the sake of an impotent monk.

026 And again, behold the noble fruits, how they profess our doctrine to be right, and yet condemn it, and war against it, and murder it. Their own right says that a single person, where he has better reason and scripture than a concilium, should give way to a whole concilium, and they lead to this the example of the Concilii Niceni, which followed the one man Paphnutio. But what do our proud, coarse asses do here? It is true (they say) what Luther writes; but because we have not taught it so, but a fainting monk, let the emperor put it to the sword. These are called papists, who respect neither God's word nor their own right. They freely confess that they do not want to respect it, but murder and do as they please.

027 Seest thou now, thou assassin, who they are that begin to war, and will not keep the peace? Whether they be thy murderous bloodhounds, the Papists, or my Lutherans? Nor may you, impudent villain, adorn yourself and your bloodhounds, that they act peaceably and do not war, and publicly present ours as rebels and peacebreakers; If thou hearest here, and otherwise knowest well, that our people at Augsburg have so warmly, humbly, patiently, most earnestly, and unceasingly asked for peace, and have never yet pretended either to threaten or to insist, nor have they ever thought of doing anyone any harm, and still to this day desire nothing else but such peace, and would gladly be silent that, if the

If the heart of the bloodhound had been vain and closed the peace in it, it should have been softened by such a humble, heartfelt, Christian request to let the peace out.

028 But there was no help for it; all had to be put down, and in short they urged and showed that they wanted to war, to murder, and to suppress; so the Diet has decided, and this is the final verdict.

29 Now you come here, dear assassin, and talk to us; your papists want to be peaceful, and the Lutherans want to fight. I am surprised that Duke George suffers such a shameful book of lies in Dresden, who wants to be so pious that he does not want to suffer an evil book even in foreign principalities. If such a book had gone out against him in this principality, as this book against our princes, God help us, how heaven and earth should tremble!

Thirty, Squire Assassins, hear now, we will speak with you. Since peace has been publicly denied to our people, and war and murder have been publicly prophesied and decreed, tell me, who is the first here to plunge the knife and draw it? Who begins the war? Is it he who kneels down there and humbly says: I pray for God's sake, keep peace, I will gladly keep peace; or is it he who says: No, you wicked one, you must take your place, I will slay you, nothing can help that. Hoi, Squire Assassin, pipe up, let's hear your judgment. Whistle at thy book, yea, whistle at thy forehead and heart, that thou may'st so brazenly before all the world give up thy assassin and shameful lies, and so wickedly lie to such pious people, and praise and adorn such obdurate bloodhounds. But thou art a papist; therefore the abominations of the papacy oppress thee, that thou must become so mad, and spew forth such shame.

031 Wherefore I say again, as before, because the Lutherans have not threatened any man, have not undertaken to do any man any harm, but have asked for peace; again, the Papists have refused peace, and have threatened with wars, and still persist and threaten that no man can but make wars to them, and have been all the hour of the strokes.

must be. Wherever this part, which asks for peace and cannot obtain it, stands up to defend itself, which I neither call nor advise, I will not reproach it, nor let it be reproached, but I will call the other part wicked, tyrannical, treacherous, and murderous, and I will reproach it myself. Thus it is written in my booklet, if thou wouldest have opened thy mouth and nose as an assassin, since thou couldst not see with thine eyes. Now you think you will interpret my words and turn them against me; no, assassin, you are not the man to teach Luther to speak German, or to take his words from him and interpret them to your liking.

032 But that thou dost boast with blind words, that it is not seen that the papists arm themselves as the Lutherans do 2c. This I truly believe, that it is not seen; for I see it not, neither do many others, as little as I see the armor of the Lutherans. But how if thou be one that knowest and seest it, and wouldest persuade us, because we see it not, that it should not matter? Who would believe that ye are not armed, because ye have made war, and have determined as ye have heard? Or perhaps ye were armed long ago, and may not arm yourselves, and now smear our mouths with such words: We will not prepare now, for ye have done it long ago. For I cannot reckon how the Elector of Brandenburg and Duke George of Saxony could promise the emperor five thousand horses, when they were sitting so completely unarmed; for it is well known that they are not capable of so much.

33 So I also know well, what two years ago and up to now for practices are driven, now to Breslau, now to Dessau, now to Leipzig and more places ridden 2c. And what a murderous council was that held at Mainz, as is known; and many are still of the opinion today that the princely Rotterianism and alliance of two years ago was certainly true, and now say that, since it could not continue the same time, it has nevertheless tried the Emperor, and finally played out to the point that it has been concluded at Augsburg, and that the Emperor is now in favour of the alliance.

1) The so-called Pack Alliance; see No. 829ff. in this volume.

now get the emperor's name and come out under the emperor's mantle. But whoever wants to believe that, I know that now, after the Imperial Diet, the papists have taken great pains to prepare themselves secretly and to order horses, but they have not been able to find what they were looking for.

034 If then they are not equipped (which I will never believe), they will certainly be sorry that they cannot equip themselves. For there is no lack of good will, as is shown in the above-mentioned pieces. What then is your high fame but this, you shameful assassin, that you say that your bloodhounds are not seen to be arming themselves, but a great, thick, strong lie, which you know that they have been arming themselves for a long time, and in short want to make war where they can, and have completely cut off peace?

035 I will tell thee another thing. If thou sayest true, and dost not deny that thy bloodhounds are not arming themselves, and ours are arming themselves; if it be true (I say), then it must be a great and excellent grace of God upon our part, that they have hitherto been so long quiet and kept the peace, and have not long since smitten thy bloodhounds over the head. Because your bloodhounds first threw the knife, and sent the war to our peaceful part. So that one deserves (according to worldly law) to think who would come first and do the first stroke; But because they have been silent so long and are still silent, and you assassin also deny everything else that you say, I will truly believe that you also deny in this as an arch-villain, who also sees and grasps in our work differently than you speak, and must help our part to honor with your lies, that they are so pious and honest, that they are also abundantly peaceable and quiet, against their public, renounced enemies, and have long since not done the first stroke, which perhaps they would and should have done according to worldly law.

(36) Yes, that is what your bloodhounds would like, that our part should not only wait for the threatened and forbidden war of their enemies, but also keep quiet, and let themselves be murdered without any defense, like slaughter sheep. My dear assassins, if you are torn to pieces, the devil will lambaste you; I, as a preacher, shall suffer it, I know it well.

He that hath grace, let him also suffer it. But I do not want to assure the bloodhounds that all others will suffer, nor can I assure them of this. For if I publicly advised our people that they should all suffer, the bloodhounds would be strengthened by it; I do not want to do that; I do not want to make them worry and fear that their murder and warfare will not be resisted. If they wish to become knights of our blood, let them do it with care and diligence, as befits honest knights. If they wish to murder, they shall wait to see what they will encounter.

Thirty-seven: and what shall I speak of it now at length? I'll read thee, O noble assassin, the true text. I suppose that all these aforesaid things are lies, and that thy bloodhounds are living saints; what wilt thou say to this: The edict has gone forth, in which our doctrine is condemned, and it is forbidden and commanded to our people (not for rebellion's sake, as thou vile assassin denieth), in express words, that they shall lose life, limb, goods, and honour, if they leave not the damned doctrine. Thou hast read these things, thou wicked one, and art not ashamed in thine heart that thou hast reproached us? Where art thou now, thou lying fool? Tell me, who doth here sow war, murder, and woe? Are they the ones who are viciously condemned by public edict, and who want to take away their life, limb, property, and everything? or are they the ones who instigated and enforced such edicts? Thou hast seals and letters for this, that all the aforesaid murderous, treacherous pieces of thy bloodhounds may be convicted and convinced.

038 Tell me, art thou bold, where have the Lutherans sent forth a letter, that they might defend themselves (I will hold their peace, that they are seditious, or that they would begin to be seditious), as here thy bloodhounds, under the pious emperor's name, let forth a public edict, wherein they condemn our doctrine, and for the same cause threaten to take from them body, life, goods, and all? Now if you and all your bloodhounds had vile infernal jaws, which spit vile fire, and peeled us eternally rebellious, we set this edict before your noses, and show you your seal and letters, that you are murderous bloodhounds. And the edict is a mighty witness that the Lu

The pope and the papists cannot be rebellious, even if they would like to be. For they cannot begin; the papists have begun with this edict. If the Lutherans sin greatly in this, it must be their sin to resist out of necessity; they have begun, and the papists have begun before them.

Thirty-nine, dear, let us reckon what this edict can do. It condemns our doctrine, and threatens to take life, limb, property, and everything. Who can interpret or understand it otherwise than that with it the sword of the whole empire is awakened, sharpened, overthrown, and already drawn. The whole empire's guns are loaded and aimed. The whole realm's armor, men and horses, are armed and embittered, and admonished that everything should go over the Elector of Saxony and his followers, to murder, to burn, to rob life, limb, wife, child, land, people, property and honor, and to fill everything with blood and sorrow. This is the edict of their murderous purpose, there are seals and letters. This is still called peaceful action; and as Junker Meuchel lies, there is no armor on his bloodhounds, but the Lutherans must be called rebellious, and the emperor would like to attack them with the sword, not because of doctrine (as the edict clearly says), but because of the rebellion that Meuchel lies to us and maliciously fabricates.

040 Now the Lutherans sit still, and must be damned, and wait every hour for the fury and violence of all the kingdom, and yet are rebellious. Dear me, what more shall they do? I think that when the assassin writes again, he will not be satisfied that we sit still and suffer, and that they condemn us, renounce us, threaten and start war and murder, but will urge us further to take the sword of the kingdom ourselves and impale ourselves on it; otherwise he will not let us be innocent of rebellion. We shall not be called peaceable, for we lie stabbed before his eyes, and drowned in blood. Ay, saith he, but nothing is yet done in the matter. Of course, this is what I have said now, that we must be stabbed and drowned in blood before we can defend ourselves or rise up.

1714 Erl. (2.) 25, 122-125. cap. 13. of the Diet of Augsburg 1530. w. xvi, 2v75-208l. 1715.

We are pious, and they are not murderous. But there are seals and letters, wills and opinions, words and intentions to do the deed, and there is a whole conatus. What the right say of this, I leave to the lawyers; my Theologia is called such saints: Cain, Saul, and Judas.

041 But they stay not at the edict and the decree, but take hold also of the deed, and execute such an edict. Where then, sayest thou? But knowest thou not? Nay. Knowest thou also a city called Halle in Saxony? There the bishop of Mainz acts quite kindly and peaceably against his pious subjects, and, they say, lets himself be heard publicly that the Elector of Brandenburg, Duke George, Duke Henry of Brunswick, are imperial executors of the edict. Devil, how great peace is there! Junker Meuchel shall call it not only a peaceful trade, but also a merry dance or paradise. And so the Papists would be quite pure, and the Lutherans quite rebellious overcome. Ah, that you desperate wicked! 2c. I would have cursed.

(42) Yea, with the subjects the rulers may deal 2c. It is true, but it is also true that the dog that eats the lappets will certainly eat the leather where he can get it. If they do this with their subjects, there is no doubt that they would do it in all the world, if only they could. As the Bishop of Mainz and the Elector of Brandenburg must prove, since they tried to attack the city of Magdeburg and wanted to execute the edict, because the city of Magdeburg did not like the peaceful trade of such peaceful people; therefore they are rightly to be scolded as seditious, where otherwise Squire Meuchel rightly says, whether they sit quietly, and do no harm to anyone, and allow themselves to be condemned, and suffer the bloodhound's rage and thunder. Now it is well known that Magdeburg is not the Elector's nor the Bishop's subject, as Halle is; nevertheless, they also wanted to eat the leather with great devotion, to act peacefully with the Lutherans.

43 I say for my right of court, I have read Muenzer's seditious books, but methinks this assassin's book is far over it. For he does it so rudely and foolishly, and does not apply any semblance of peace, that [it] does not almost move, but rather deters. But this wicked man is a cruel coiner, in that he praises peace, and yet under it he does things so vexatiously, as if he wanted to force the people and urge them to rebellion. For you yourself must reckon that he knows what was done at Augsburg against our people (as reported above); he knows that an edict has gone out in which peace is denied to the Lutherans and war and murder are forbidden; he knows that their part has already begun the deed; he knows and sees that the Lutherans are sitting quietly, suffering and waiting for all their rages, and yet he praises his bloodhounds as peaceful and scolds the Lutherans as rebellious.

44. If it were not for the great mercy of God upon us, it would be impossible for our nature to bear such unpleasant wickedness, that we should not only be condemned to hear of war and murder from our enemies, who have renounced us, and should leave our life, limb, goods, wife, children, land, and people to be driven about every hour, and know that they intend all this in earnest, and have already begun the deed honestly, and in addition still sit quietly and suffer, but shall also bear the shame that we are rebellious in all this, and they, the perpetrators, have the honor that they are peaceful and act peaceably. It would be (by God!) no wonder that out of this would come a clamor, since not a hair nor a skin would remain of the papists. What is the point of such high, excessive, unpleasant attempts?

(45) Yes, the Lutherans want to be Christians, therefore they should suffer and not defend themselves (2c). True; but the papists want to be even better Christians, and condemn the Lutherans; therefore they should also murder much less and shed blood against God and right. But if they can remain holy Christians, and yet, as traitors and evil-doers, innocently shed blood, murder, burn, and torment pious people without cause, then the Lutherans can much more remain good Christians, and yet defend themselves a little against such bloodhounds and ravagers. Although the Lutherans do not yet do so. For if they would defend themselves, and would not much rather have peace the Elector of Saxony, together with his followers, should now protect and save those in Halle, since the Lutherans are now being severely attacked. For just as the bloodhounds boast that they have united at Augsburg, and have put together land, people, blood, and goods, whoever attacks one should have attacked them all, so ours should also say: Those at Halle are Lutheran, and are now being attacked, therefore the Elector of Saxony, together with all his relatives, and all Lutherans are also being attacked. If one is to apply, then the other must also apply. Now my Lutherans do not do this, they sit quietly, let themselves be tortured and plagued by their bloodhounds, after all their courage, and Junker Meuchel, the noble scribe, scolds them rebelliously to me.

046 But if thou sayest that thine opinion is, where the Lutherans rise up in rebellion, and would take from the people their own, then the emperor ought to attack them with the sword. Dear Hans Worst, who knows not this? There is great art here; I have written better of it than you and all the papists will ever learn or write, and you learned it from me-before you would not have known how to advise anyone. But thou wicked one knowest that the Lutherans, when they arm themselves against you murderers, may not be rebellious; nor can they rise up against you; for you murderers have begun, and have both attacked with edict and sword. Now what they do against you I will neither praise nor reproach; but you shall not interpret it to me as a rebellion, but let it be and be called only a rebellion against murderers and evil-doers, and you shall have no thanks. What is it now said, thou dear lululemon: where the Lutherans are indignant 2c. Yea, they have reproached themselves in their prudence! It is just as if I said, If the ass had wings, it would fly; if the Lutherans were cranes, they would fly in the air.

047 Thou must not teach us to be obedient to Caesar, and to punish the rebellious. But here you should prove your art, and convince the Lutherans that they are rebellious. There lies the knot. If you do that, I will take you for a man; but here you are silent and you run about, meanwhile you spout much, and click the paper with unnecessary words, how one should punish the rebels, as if you had just come down from heaven with such a new art. If you nevertheless call us rebels, and cannot make it true nor prove it, do you know what such fellows are called in German lands? They are called desperate boys, traitors, and dishonorable villains, who take away the honor of pious, innocent people with their poisonous mouths, and want to deprive them of life and limb; that is your right name, you be who you will.

048 And, lo, the scripture shall not fail me, neither shall it lie; which sheweth that the world is fine, either Cain, or the children of Habel, either the children of the devil, or the children of God. What is Cain and the devil's, there must be a murderer and a bloodhound in it; what is Habel, there must be a pious, peaceful heart in it. Now it is easy to tell from the fruit which is Cain or which isabel in this case. The papists did not want to observe peace, but decided on the Diet with anger and wrath, then instigated the murder with the edict, and began the deed. My assassin himself must not deny this. Again, the Lutherans have asked and still ask for peace without ceasing, and have suffered all ridicule, scorn, disgrace, defiance, and pride because of it, and still sit quietly and tolerate their raging.

49 Since it is now clear that the papists themselves confess, by words and deeds, that they are our enemies and against us, Doctor Martini's true judgment, founded in Scripture and proven by those fruits, is that the papists must certainly have in mind, day and night, striving, lurking, practicing, how to destroy and exterminate us. Every man may be sure of this, and of no better than they. And there is no doubt that what they do about it, friendly or peaceful, must be a treacherous thing, and Judas' kiss; or they must do it out of worry and fear, that they are not yet able to do what they would like to do. This is the sentence I have given to our people and to all the world, and whoever wishes to do so must be judged by it. I know that I do not lie, unless the Scripture is false. Therefore this assassin is a two-faced wicked man...

1718 Erl. (2.) 25, 127f. cap. 13. of the Imperial Diet at Augsburg 1530. w. LVI, 2084-2087. 1719

Who knoweth all these things well in his heart, and yet setteth his bloodhounds before us as the pious and peaceable, with whom there shall be more fruits of faith than with us.

(50) This I will have said this time in defense of my books against this assassin, and confess that he has me as an evil-doer. But I had to hurry to the Leipzig market; but soon after I will comb his fine tender book further. For there is still much good papist virtue in it, and ask nothing of it, that he complains: there are almost all evil words and devils named in it; that shall be my glory and honor, and I want it to be so, that it shall be said of me henceforth, how I am full of evil words, scolding and cursing about the papists. For more than ten years I have often humbled myself and given the very best words, so that I have made them the longer the angrier, and the peasants have only become the more puffed up by their pleading. But now, because they have decided to do no good, no evil, but only evil, so that there is no hope, I will also curse and smash myself to pieces with the evil worshippers, right into my pit, and they will no longer hear a good word from me. I will ring to their graves with my thunder and lightning.

011 For I cannot pray, but must curse. If I should say, Hallowed be thy name, I must say, Cursed, damned, profaned be the name of the Papists, and of all them that blaspheme thy name. If I should say, Thy kingdom come, I must say, Cursed, damned, and destroyed be the papacy, and all the kingdoms of the earth that are contrary to thy kingdom. If I should say, Thy will be done, I must say, Cursed, damned, defiled, and destroyed be all the thoughts and designs of the papists, and of all that strive against thy will and counsel. Truly I pray verbally every day, and with my heart without ceasing, and with me all who believe in Christ, and I feel that it will be heard. For one must see God's miracles, how he destroys this terrible imperial diet and the immeasurable raging of the papists, and also how he thoroughly destroys them.

...will make it impossible for me to live. Nevertheless, I keep a good, kind, peaceful and Christian heart towards everyone; even my greatest enemies know this.

52 Therefore I now close this booklet, that in my warning I have not incited to rebellion, as this assassin lies, no one will prove it from it; but I have wanted to deter the papists and everyone, so that they would not obey the murderous edict; and I have also not wanted to advise ours to fight back. In this way I have tried to keep and advise peace on both sides. Where the papists were not deterred, and some did not want to resist them, in such a case, because I could not keep a part, I tied a shillelagh to the neck of the murderers, and to the other, innocent part, the bloodhounds to suffer and be condemned, to the bloodhounds' grief and annoyance, that the papists should not be able to boast (as they would like to do) as if they punished or murdered rebels, and that these should not have to consider their opposition disobedience or rebellion. Such my opinion my books show clearly, that I truly know. God help the truth, amen.

Carolus.

A. Valdesius.

(1) In order that the Emperor might unite the many disputed religions in the Empire of the German Nation, keep the steadfast in the right faith, confirm the wavering, and (where possible) raise up the fallen, he appointed a general Diet of all the estates in Augsburg, after Welschland had been brought to peace. When he heard that nearly all the princes and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire were coming, and that the Lutherans had been defeated, he ordered a general assembly to be held at Augsburg. When he heard that almost all the princes and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire were coming, and that the Lutheran preachers, who were everywhere openly teaching their doctrine, had been brought by their princes, and that many of the marks and secrets of our religion had been abolished in the city, he celebrated this much less to begin on Green Thursday 1) there, so that he might solemnly celebrate, even against the will of the heretics, the services held by our forefathers, which had long been omitted in the city. The estates of the Holy Roman Empire, however, when they heard that the Emperor was arriving, marched to meet him with the Augsburg Council in great splendor; and when they escorted him into the city, and the Elector of Saxony, according to custom, presented a mere sword of the Imperial Majesty to the Emperor, the Emperor was presented with a sword of the Holy Roman Empire. Majest. the bishop and chapter of the city received him and led him into the church of the cathedral, where he received the blessing of the pope's envoy, Cardinal Campegio, who had come with him and had been present at all the religious acts that followed at the same imperial diet, received the blessing, after which he departed to his palace, and had the princes announce that he would immediately on the following day have the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ (inasmuch as it had come to him from his ancestors) led through the city. When on the same day the King of Hungary and Bohemia, and the other Electors and Princes of the Empire came to the Emperor, with the exception of Elector John of Saxony, Margrave George of Brandenburg, Duke Ernst of Lüneburg, Landgrave Philip of Hesse, Prince Wolf of Anhalt, and other adherents of the Lutheran doctrine, the body of our dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ was brought to the Emperor.

1) This is wrong. It was the Thursday after Trinity, the day of Corpus Christi. The day before the emperor arrived. with ordinary ceremonies and all deference.

(2) Thereafter, by the Emperor's command, in spite of the Lutherans' objections, it was publicly proclaimed and enjoined that no one should preach in the city without the Emperor's indulgence. Majesty should preach in the city. And before he began the imperial action, the Emperor, together with the princes, princes and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, ordered himself to the main church to celebrate the mass which Archbishop Albrecht of Mainz, Cardinal and Elector of the Holy Roman Church, had celebrated. Church Cardinal and Elector, held by the Holy Spirit with ordinary ceremonies, and the prayer which Pimpinellus, Archbishop of Rosan, publicly and gracefully heard, and after the same had recited to the Imperial Estates by Count Palatine Frederick of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria:

(3) He would therefore have gone from his Hispanic considerable hereditary kingdoms, and from his wife and young reign, first to Welschland, and afterwards to Germany, that he might receive the crown of the empire there, but here set the German minds, which had been seduced and made restless by new errors, in unity and tranquillity. Since all things had been happily accomplished in the French, after the bestowal of divine grace, he admonished the estates that in Germany, too, each in his own place would help to further his Christian and praiseworthy intentions for the benefit of the common fatherland.

(4) Thereupon the Lutheran princes named above, and with them two cities, Nuremberg and Reutlingen, for four days presented a document in Latin and German to the emperor, with the condition that it be read publicly in the imperial council, in the opinion that it would win applause. When the Emperor noticed this, he did not want to grant their request. However, in order that men might see how graciously and kindly he dealt with them, he permitted the following day, not that, according to their request, the same document might be read out in the council chamber, but rather in the imperial court; to the extent that, in the presence and presence of the emperor, king of Hungary, and the estates of the empire, this was done and, after the reading, the same document was handed over.

005 But because they wished to maintain their sectarian doctrine and opinion with many causes, and because some things agreed with the Gospel and the Holy Scriptures, but most of them were flatly contrary to them, the emperor, upon counsel taken beforehand with the papal authority, has given them the right to be heard.

The Emperor has ordered the Catholic, honorable, and highly learned men of the Holy Scriptures of various nations, envoys and princes of the empire, to let pass that which they would consider good in the confession handed over, but to refute the other. This rebuttal, after it had been approved by the authorities, the papal envoy and the princes of the empire, was read out by the emperor to the estates of the empire, and among them to the Lutheran princes themselves, at the very place where their confession or confession had been read out. And although the Lutheran princes most earnestly requested and desired a copy of the refutation, the Emperor, in order that what had once been adopted by Christian synods and held immovable by the dear ancients might not be drawn into doubt or dispute, by no means let it be communicated to them.

(6) But the Electors and the other Catholic princes of the empire, when they heard how the emperor expressly exhorted the Lutheran princes to desist from their false delusions and errors, and to return to the common Christian church; or, if they did not wish to do so, he could not avoid doing that which his imperial office and conscience would require in order to control this evil. On the other hand, as they, the Lutherans, did not mean to deviate from their opinion, to which they had once surrendered, they, as peace-lovers, petitioned the Emperor that they should cultivate negotiations and try to see if by some means the dissension could be brought to an equal understanding. And for this purpose the Archbishop of Mainz, Elector, the Bishop of Strasbourg, Duke George of Saxony, Duke Henry of Brunswick, and Duke Albrecht of Mecklenburg, as well as George Truchsess, the Archduke of Austria, and several other imperial princes' delegates, have been ordered by common consent. When they gathered together in one place with the Lutheran princes, Margrave Joachim of Brandenburg, a brave protector of the Christian religion, made a long speech on this opinion in the name of the Catholic estates:

(7) They were well aware of how anxious they were that the Emperor should grant them an amicable negotiation with the Lutheran princes, 1) and where possible to settle the matter; for this reason he reminded them, the Lutheran princes, that they should consider how clear and open the matter is.

1) With Walch: entertainment.

I have the honor to dispute with the Gospel and apostolic writings the doctrines they have recently accepted; likewise, what a loss of many souls, shedding of Christian blood, and misery would result throughout Germany if they did not obey the imperial commandments and in part prevented what should be decided and decreed for the good of Christendom and especially the common fatherland of the German nation on this day. I further request that they allow themselves to be softened by the pleas of many relatives and blood relatives, as well as brothers-in-law and friends, to renounce their false hopes, and not to be found separated from the common church any longer. For if some abuses had crept into common Christianity, the emperor would now have come to Germany to abolish them with the help and advice of the pope and to establish peace and unity in the empire.

(8) To this the Lutheran princes, after asking for time to consider, answered in writing and at length after several days: because they knew that the confession or creed, which they had recently delivered, was in agreement with the Gospel and apostolic writings, that they could therefore neither yield to the Emperor's refutation, nor renounce their doctrine and opinion with an unimpaired conscience. And when many things had been further argued and acted upon by both parties, and the Lutherans complained that they had not been sufficiently heard, nor that a common Christian council had been appointed after the Diet of Speier, the Catholics answered: It would have been their duty to obey the Edict of Worms (as is only right), and not to draw into doubt and dispute so many articles of faith, which, according to the common counsel of so many holy, God-fearing people, would have been accepted and popular, and sealed with the blood of so many martyrs, in a manner that is quite unpleasant and forbidden by corporal punishment, and to make use of their consciences. As if it were not sufficiently known and evident what kind of consciences they had, and how wantonly they separated themselves from the Catholic Church, made new laws of their own, which had nothing to do with the apostolic ones, took in and nurtured new sect masters, and were ever too at odds with themselves in doctrine, now for Lutherans, soon for Anabaptists, then for sacrament violators and iconoclasts, and what more such abominable sects might be called. Yes, if they would look at their teachers' lives and customs a little better, they would undoubtedly easily themselves, how beautiful, praiseworthy, and fine it would be for them to trust such people with their honor, goods, bodies, and souls, and to give more credence to them than to so many councils of the common Christian church, so many writings and judgments of the orthodox church fathers, and finally to the emperor himself, whose irreproachable customs should move them to a different course, as well as to so many princes related by blood and otherwise. Indeed, if they were to see the fruit of this new doctrine, namely, tumult, rebellion, strife, and contention, and more such harm and inconvenience, they would be able to discern more clearly than the bright sun the spirit from which such a doctrine came. But as far as a Christian concilium was concerned, although it was known to everyone what their teachers thought of concilia, how rashly they contradicted them, and how they weakened and despised the prestige and power of the conciliorum: the emperor, as he is most concerned about the welfare and peace of the German nation, would always see to it that a common concilium, which has been prevented by war until now, is scheduled, if they meanwhile abandon their errors, undertake something new, remain in the old state until a synod's decision, and would rather adhere to the emperor and the common Christian church than to their "seductive" teachers.

(9) By which Christian remembrance, when the Lutherans found themselves moved, they asked time to answer, and thereupon said that they were not a little offended by such sharp remonstrance. To which the Catholics replied that what had been brought forward in their name had not been done to offend them in any way, or to say anything against them, but only to seek agreement with them. But after several days, the Lutheran princes, together with the two cities mentioned above and four others that had come to them in the meantime, made a written statement in response to what had recently been held against them, rejected and repudiated everything, and thus revealed their obstinacy much more clearly than before.

(10) Because little was accomplished by this negotiation, the subcontractors thought it best to attack the work in other ways, and to select some experienced and learned people to hold a discussion with the Lutherans and try to find a way to unity. To this end, with the consent of the Emperor, who wished to see quarrels and strife reduced, the following were immediately appointed: the Bishop of Augsburg, Duke Heinrich of Brunswick, likewise D. Eck, Cochläus, and Wimpina, scholars of the Holy Scriptures; and of jurists, the Chancellors of Cologne and Baden. But when these seven Catholics had long argued with seven Lutherans, and had reached agreement in many articles, the Lutherans did not want to deviate from the content and opinion of the following articles:

- 1) That in confession it is not necessary to recount all sins.
- 2) That the satisfaction for sin, for the remission of the punishment of sin, is not meritorious.
- 3) That the vows and doctrines concerning the choice of meals and days are quite useless and contrary to the gospel.
- 4) That no works of men, be they ever so good as they will, can be ascribed any merit.
- 5) That the invocation of the saints is quite dangerous.
- 6) That the blessed bread shall not be carried about through the streets.
- 7) That those hardly sin who go to the table of the Lord in one form only.
- 8) That laymen who ask for only one form should not be given it.
- 9) That one may bless bread and wine otherwise than at Mass.
- 10) That the priests, monks, and nuns are not forbidden to be free.
- 11) That private masses may not be held according to the old custom and institution of the Roman Church.
- 12) That the masses for the living and the dead are of no avail.
- 13) That the 40-day fast and other fasts set by the Church should not be kept.

(11) Of these and other such errors, of which Luther's and the Lutheran books are full, they have not been able to be led away with any harmless discussion, although they have admitted many things, the contradiction of which they have taught before, and have proved so fickle that what they yielded today, they revoked tomorrow, and the day after tomorrow again approved and considered acceptable.

(12) For this reason, since the desired unity is so unlikely to be achieved by this means, it was considered advisable to make such a parting of the ways, lest they should leave each other without having achieved anything:

- (13) That they stand firm on the points on which they have agreed this time. The others should all be postponed until
- a future Conciliar decision, and the Lutherans should be

The monks are to be faithful and obedient to the Holy Roman and Catholic Church; they are to keep silent about the incompatible articles, nor are they to disclose or teach anything about them. The monks who are still in their monasteries are to use their statutes and ceremonies freely and without hindrance. The abandoned monasteries, convents, and other ecclesiastical properties, however, which have been confiscated by the Lutheran princes and estates, are to be administered by faithful people whom the emperor will appoint for this purpose, until a common synod decides to give an account of this. The poor and the monks who have been expelled from their monasteries are to receive their sustenance from their estates, but the Lutheran princes are not to object to this. The common and special masses should be held with ordinary ceremonies and festivities. If, however, any of these ceremonies and festivities were to be considered controversial, they were to be postponed to a future synod. In addition, the Lutherans were to remain quiet and calm, not to spread or undertake anything new, and in other common Christian affairs, and especially in the affairs of the Holy Roman Empire, as befits noble princes, they were to render obedience and assistance to the Emperor.

014 Which decree, though it did not seem to be unpleasant to the Lutherans for many reasons, yet because the Lutheran princes and many cities had robbed many churches, and taken property from many monasteries and convents, which they should have restored according to this council, which seemed very hard to them, they could by no means be persuaded to accept it.

(15) Thereupon the emperor, so that he would not omit anything that would only serve and be profitable to gain the obstinacy of the people, summoned the Lutheran princes especially to him, and admonished them to turn back with so much kind and gracious waiting that iron, not to mention fleshly hearts, might have been softened by it. At first, however, they surrendered themselves completely to the emperor for all submissiveness and obedience in all things, as much as could, should, or would always be done with an uninjured conscience; but when it was requested of them in a more actual and explicit manner that what they had done new in Christian doctrine should be restored to the previous and old status until the future Council's decision, they only gave to understand that they wanted to adhere to the Speierian imperial decree, in the part that had been set.

was that each one should live in such a way that he could give an account to God the Almighty, and to the Concilio, of his actions and omissions, until a future Concilium.

(16) As far as the rest was concerned, however, they had already decided to remain with the appeal, which they had objected to at the Diet of Speier. And even though they had been circumstantially reproached for being so unstable, and now wanted to adhere to the Speierian imperial decree, now to the appeal, against which they objected, that even such appeals and appeals in matters of faith would not take place, still nothing was accomplished with them, because the longer, the more stubbornly they sought out their consciences, evangelia, souls, appeals and appeals, and threw them in the way. Therefore, all hope for unity, which the Lutheran princes themselves, and their most distinguished teachers, had publicly and secretly offered to the emperor, and to the envoy, both with words and with writings, three months after each other, has completely disappeared.

(17) When the emperor saw that the Lutherans were becoming more and more obstinate, and that no kindness would be shown them, because they cared so little for the reputation of the forefathers, the gospel, and the holy Scriptures, he issued another decree on Sept. 22, saying that his imperial majesty had set up a Diet at Augsburg, so that, with the advice of all the estates of the empire, Christianity and the German nation before it, things might be put right and the disputes that had arisen over religion might be settled. Majesty had therefore set a Diet in Augsburg, so that with the mature counsel of all the estates of the empire of Christendom and before the German nation, things might be put right, and the disputes that had arisen over religion might be resolved. In order that he might accomplish this more effectively, he would have listened to the Lutheran confession, and what he found contrary to Christian truth therein would have been refuted by the Holy Scriptures, and he would have given him the unquestionable thought that, since the truth would be laid before their eyes more clearly than the bright sun, and his Imperial Majesty, as well as the others, would be able to see the truth, he would have been able to see it more clearly than the bright sun. Majesty, and also the minds of the other princes and rulers, they would put aside the erroneous opinions of their sect. But since they have discarded some, but have retained most of those in which they are at odds with the Roman Church, and His Imperial Majesty has decided not to subordinate anything to the Roman Church, they have decided not to subordinate anything to the Roman Church. He wanted to appoint them a period of reflection until April 15 of the next year, during which they were to declare with seals and letters whether they wished to keep to the Roman Catholic Church in the uncompromised articles, until a future Conciliar decision, or not? They should take care and ensure that no new religious trafficking takes place or is sold in their territories, and that peace and unanimity prevail among all the princes, rulers, and cities of the Holy Roman Empire. In this way, they should not attract foreign subjects to themselves, or lure them to their sect and faith. And if any of their own subjects, whether of ecclesiastical or secular rank, should wish to retain the old faith and ceremonies, or to rejoin them, they should not hinder them in any way, but allow them to use their church customs and ceremonies without hindrance, and should not cause them any trouble on that account. In order to abolish and completely eradicate the Anabaptist and sacramental desecration sects, they should assist the Emperor, the Catholic Princes, Princes, and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire with counsel and action, as the Catholic Princes have already promised the Emperor. However, as far as a common council is concerned, which has been so much and often desired by all the estates of the empire, both Catholic and Lutheran, and which has so far been prevented by the force of war, the emperor will make a provision to the pope, as well as to the other kings and princes of Christendom, that within six months after the end of this imperial council, a common Christian meeting will be scheduled, and within one year after the schedule has been set, it will be held. I have no doubt that through this meeting, by the grace of the Lord Christ, who will undoubtedly be with those gathered in his name, all controversial religious matters will be settled, and dear Christianity will be helped to a lasting, eternal peace.

(18) When the Lutherans were heard, there was so much lack of their thanking the emperor for such a gracious decree, that they even much more refused to accept it altogether, arguing that their doctrine was so founded in the holy Scriptures, that they could neither renounce it in some ways, nor, with their consciences intact, keep others from it, nor rather promote it. And what therefore was taught and acted by them would not have flowed from them as well as from God Himself. They could have easily refuted the imperial refutation of their confession with testimonies from the Gospel and the apostolic writings, as they had already begun, if they had been given a copy of it.

19th Whereupon the Elector of Brandenburg in the

In the name of the emperor, the Lutheran princes and cities have addressed this opinion:

20. The imperial majesty cannot be sufficiently surprised that they may publicly pretend that they are so founded in their futile delusion that they cannot be mistaken at all, and what has been done by them up to now would rather be of God's command than of their own discretion, because everyone can see that their preachers have not brought anything new into the world, but have, as it were, resurrected from hell and from the dead what was condemned and buried many years ago by the holy fathers. And if the emperor had nowhere read in the Gospel, of which they boasted everywhere, that it was permitted to take other people's goods, and to keep by force what had once been taken, contrary to the will of the rightful lords, and if one were asked at some time or other to restore the stolen goods, then to say that one could not restore them with a good conscience. The emperor was also surprised at the boldness with which they could proclaim the orthodox doctrine to which the emperor and the other imperial estates adhered to be false, as if it were not a great sacrilege to believe that so many pious Christian emperors, so many princes and rulers, in so many hundreds of years, had erred, and had not rightly understood the doctrine which they professed. Since this is not at all like the truth, the emperor can neither put up with their presumption, nor approve and endorse their doings and actions. If they now understand and accept yesterday's decree (which the Emperor again earnestly admonished them to accept), they will undoubtedly recognize that it is meant for their good and to preserve peace and unity in Germany. If, however, they did not want to accept it, they should consider for themselves how much misfortune they would thereby cause and bring about, and not at all hope that anything would be changed in it, because nothing more could be yielded to them without violation of all respectability and godliness; otherwise, however, since they would obediently submit themselves to the treaty, they should have a gracious emperor in all their affairs. And they would have done wisely by not bringing forward the answer to the imperial refutation of their confession, and by sparing themselves with vain toil and labor, since they did not want to allow that one should dispute articles of faith without her Majesty's knowledge. But that Imperial Majesty's refutation had not been communicated to them in copy, they would never want to-

to anyone but themselves, because they would not have wanted to accept the condition that was proposed next to it.

21. when this in the name of kaiserl. Majest. Prince Joachim of Brandenburg, he added this in his name and in the name of all the imperial estates: they, the princes and cities, were themselves well aware of how diligently the Catholic princes themselves had acted with them at first, and then their representatives for discussion and dialogue, so that these disputes and disagreements might be resolved and the beloved fatherland might be brought to good trust. But what they had done with it was not known to them. For this reason, he again asked them to accept the imperial treaty and to consider how much damage would result to the common Christianity and to Germany before it if they did not allow themselves to be moved to do so by any plea. If, however, they would allow such a request to be made, the other states would be willing and inclined to accept the same with all servitude. If not, they should know that the other princes, rulers, and estates of the empire have already resolved to support their emperor with all loyalty and allegiance, and to shed not only their goods, but also their blood beside him: even so, the emperor would not only have surrendered all his kingdoms and dominions, but also his body, blood, and soul for the Christian religion, and its and their teachers and confessors, to God the Lord. Even if he had not wanted to leave the soil of the empire before, he would have seen these things brought into a better state and order.

022 To which the Lutherans answered again with more truth: they were sure that their opinion was not based on evil grounds, but on the holy Scriptures; they also trusted them to prove it before the last judgment. And they wondered not a little how they might be reproached for having stolen other people's goods and still withholding them from them, since they had never taken from anyone what was theirs, and since they wanted to suffer the future Council and the Emperor's Majesty's judgment, since they had confiscated some monasteries and their goods, whether they had done right or wrong in them, and whether they were obliged to restore them or not. But since they could not in good conscience accept the emperor's leave, they requested that the matter be postponed until April 15. Thereafter they turned to the princes, princes, and other estates of the empire, and for this reason appealed to them sharply, that they alone should wait for the Emperor's and wanted to be regarded as the obedient ones, since they, the Lutherans, are no less willing to recognize the imperial majesty as their supreme head and lord and to obey him as faithful subjects. Majesty for their supreme head and lord, and to obey him as pious and faithful subjects.

23 To which the Elector of Brandenburg again replied: the Emperor does not wish to enter into any dispute or quarrel with them about their answer, because he is sufficiently aware that their new doctrine has long since been condemned by the Conciliorum judgment and council, and has been expelled from the Christian Church as contrary to the Protestant and Apostolic Scriptures. But since they wanted to accept the imperial decree, in which nothing could be changed, the imperial majesty and the other states wanted to change it. Majesty and the other estates would do again what they ought to do by right and equity. But if not, then not only would the Emperor have to negotiate with the princes, princes, and other imperial estates another agreement and decree, so that the Christian religion could be protected and managed, and the rebellious teachings could be purged from the empire, but also the Pope, kings, princes, and authorities of Christendom would have to be informed of these things, and the diligence would have to be applied that would be required of a Roman Emperor as protector of the faith, and of Catholic princes in this case. And it would be well known that the pope and the other kings, princes, and authorities of Christendom do not abandon the emperor and the electors, nor the princes and estates of the empire, but rather resolve to assist them with help, counsel, and action. And since it was forbidden in all ecclesiastical and secular laws to deprive another of his own, just as only too many ecclesiastics complained and pleaded with the Emperor that they had done so in their territories, and provided in law that the deprived should above all be restored to his own: The Emperor again earnestly admonished them that they should restore to their rightful lords the monasteries, churches and convents or orders, estates, dominions, lands and fiefs which they had taken contrary to law and equity, and that they should restore to their monasteries and estates the ecclesiastical men and women who had been expelled, so that the Emperor would not be compelled to do otherwise. But the fact that the Catholic estates came to the Emperor was for no other reason than that they might, with common counsel, better protect the Christian religion brought to them by their forefathers and, first of all, that God the Almighty might take care of the matter.

And hereafter do the emperor, their lord and head, due honor and service. And from this and other movements or councils they would have come to such a composition. But how supposedly innocent the opposite would be, and how they would have given the emperor and the estates of the empire more than too much cause to complain, could easily be judged by those who remembered which part broke the imperial edict of Worms and led to the shameful uprising of the common rabble, and had seen that in his lands and dominions the honor and dignity of the emperor, then of the Hungarian and Bohemian king, and soon of the princes, princes and all the estates of the empire had been publicly attacked from time to time with defamatory writings and with impunity. Also, the Emperor's own honor, welfare, and goodness would have been compromised, and those who are now in place would have deviated from the Worms Decree once accepted by the Emperor, and with their own approval and consent. Thus they should indicate by what right or equity they thought they had the right to revoke what they had once affirmed with their seal. If they would now do the same, and consider what is more suggested, they could easily become aware of how pure and innocent they are. For there are many other reasons why they should have incurred the hatred and disfavor of the people through their own guilt, and for the sake of this beloved brevity he must remain silent.

(24) To which the Lutherans thus said: they had listened with due reverence to what had been brought to them in the name of 1) Imperial Majesty and the Imperial Estates. Majesty and the imperial estates to them. And although their necessity required that they answer to every point in particular, they must nevertheless, for the sake of brevity of time, only touch upon this, that they hoped in all desperation that they would be given and granted a copy of the adopted treaty of confession and time to confer with one another. But because they saw that the Emperor did not consent to this, nor was it due to them to give their Imperial Majesty measure and order in this matter. They wish that Her Imperial Majesty and all the estates of the Empire will certainly consider that they do not want to refuse to accept the parting, if they can always do so with a good conscience. And herewith ask again what they asked before through Georg Truchsessen and the Chancellor of Baden, namely, that they be granted the farewell made.

1) Walch: an; immediately following "in" instead of "an".

They wish to be granted half a period of reflection until April 15, on which day they wish to declare with letter and seal what they intend to do, and ask the Imperial Majesty not to be moved to any disgrace against them. Majesty that they would not allow themselves to be moved to any disgrace against them, and that they would thereby most humbly command themselves to God and to their Imperial Majesty, as their most gracious Lord.

(25) Next, they repeated their previous complaint that the other princes had departed from them and gone to the emperor, because they had never given her any cause for complaint, nor (when they had been blamed) had they aroused the revolt of the common rabble. Yes, it is so far away that the Elector of Saxony is the founder of the same rebellion, that he also resisted it splendidly, yes, contested it much more bravely than others, which the Acta of the Diet of Speier would easily prove, if one were to look at them. For this reason, they ask the Emperor and the other estates to refrain from disgraceful and unpleasant decisions against them, nor to give credence to such a request.

(26) To this the Elector of Brandenburg said: the Emperor had heard what they had brought forward, and had completely agreed not to depart from the agreement once made, nor to allow them the requested time for reflection, because in matters of faith no delay is to be allowed for deliberation and debate. Thus the other estates also wanted to persist in the opinion they had presented to them, as befits catholic people, and they do not accept the apology they have presented, because their grievances are only known to men, 2) than that they could be disguised with some pretended appearance.

(27) To this the Lutherans replied that they likewise wished to leave it at their opinion, and to entrust the matter to the Almighty, to whom alone it concerned, imperial majesty, most humbly requesting that they remain their most gracious emperor. Majesty, asking most humbly that they be and remain your most gracious emperor and lord.

(28) But the Elector of Brandenburg answered that it would be sufficient to show how the Emperor, together with the Catholic Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Empire, would unanimously persevere in the Catholic parting. Therefore, several words would be unnecessary.

029 After which the Lutherans all departed, and the same day the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Lüneburg departed from Augsburg.

030 Now that, in the present measure, the Lutherans are thus acted upon, the four cities of the kingdom, Costnitz, Strasbourg, and the Holy Roman Empire, hand over the Lutherans.

bürg, Memmingen and Lindau, a strange confession or writing, not only with Lutheran, but also with many other errors against the most holy mystery of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ and other points of the Christian faith, so often that it was also not worthy of any answer.

1160 Beginning of the work written by D. Gregorius Brück, to correct the very deficient and often untrue papist report (No. 1159), under the title: "Handlung der Religionssache zu Augsburg."

This work is usually cited as "Brück's History of the Augsburg Diet". The manuscript of the same is in the Weimar Archives, 8.6A. toi. Müller, "Historie der Protestation," 2c., brings from it many of the principal pieces, some of which have been included in this volume. Walch has had this "beginning" printed from Cyprian's Beilagen zur Historie der Augsbürgischen Confession, p. 103, because it is clear from it what is to be thought of the preceding "report."

1. after the most illustrious, highborn princes, noble and wellborn counts, Mr. Johann, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire and Elector, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen; Mr. Georg, Margrave of Brandenburg, of Stettin, Pomerania, the Cassuben and Wenden 2c. Duke, Burgrave of Nuremberg and Prince of Rügen, on Oderburg; Messrs. Ernst and Franciscus, brothers, Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg; Mr. Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen, on Dietz, Ziegenhain and Nidda; Lord Wolfgang, Prince of Anhalt, Count of Ascanien and Lord of Berneburg, and Lord Gebhard and Lord Albrecht, brothers, Counts and Lords of Mansfeld; also the honorable free and imperial cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Costnitz, Ulm, Magdeburg, Bremen, Reitlingen, Heilbrunn, Memmingen, Lindau, Kempten, Jsni, Biberach, Winsheim and Weißenburg am Nordgau 2c., shortly crazy days come into believing experience, how a booklet should have gone out in print in Latin, under this title or inscription: "For the Christian religion passed acts, at the Diet of Augsburg, after the birth of the Lord, a thousand five hundred and thirty." After this, several of these books came to the attention of their electors and princes. They have seen and read their unanimous contents.

002 And howbeit a writing, in the shape of an alleged privilege, charging that the

The same shall not be reprinted by others in a named year, with avoidance of a heavy penalty: "Of the most majestic, grand and invincible prince and lord, Lord Carl the Fifth, Roman Emperor 2c., our most gracious lord" 2c., so that the poet of the same booklet, together with the printer, may appear to make people believe that Her Imperial Majesty had foreknowledge of the contents of the same booklet, and that it is Her Majesty's gracious favor and will to do so. Majesty had knowledge of the contents of this booklet, and that it was her Majesty's gracious permission and will to publish the Augsburg action in question, as far as religion is concerned, in the manner in which the poet has written it, then her electoral and princely sovereigns and the imperial cities can nevertheless make it appear that the poet has not been aware of the contents of this booklet. and the imperial cities, mentioned above, cannot take it for them, nor do they know how to believe that such a supposed description of the acts that took place of such an opinion, as the aforementioned poet indicated in the booklet with too much mild, also too little report and expressed insensitivity, also concealed truth, 1) with imperial majesty as a most virtuous, most powerful emperor [approval], 2) should have happened or come about.

(3) Their sovereigns and princes also know that their majesty is too virtuous. and the cities, out of subservience to their Majesty, as their Lord and Emperor, are too virtuous that their Majesty's mind should be, beforehand, out of God's Word, on their Electoral and Princely Graces and the cities, as their Majesty's most subservient Electors, Princes and Estates. and the cities, as her Majesty's most subservient Electors, Princes, and Estates, in such a manner as has been done with this printed booklet by too few and also too many mild reports within and outside the Empire of the German Nation, and especially because males, who were at the next Imperial Diet in Augsburg, know how more than once to their Electors and Princes and the cities, from her Majesty's word. and the cities, on account of their Majesty, for special moving causes, to keep some acts of religion secret and not to let them come into print.

4th For, where it is to be considered that this printing was given with her majesty's prior knowledge, with which nothing but vain displeasure was to be blamed on the aforementioned elector, princes, and cities, by the poet: so it should also be further heard that it would not be contrary nor opposed to her majesty that all that would again be brought into print and given for a counter-report, which would be contrary to her elector, princes, and cities.

and Princely. Gn. also the cities' Christian need to reject the disrepute which has been visited on them, but first of all on the Gospel and God's Word, both in the realm and outside it, by all Christian potentates and estates.

(5) And even if Her Majesty had the right science to see that the acts performed in Augsburg for the sake of religion should be printed, it is certainly not in Her Majesty's mind and good pleasure that the poet should destroy the acts in such a way as happened. The poet, however, has not been pleased by her Majesty's mind and good pleasure that he should mutilate the aforementioned acts in such a way as has happened, express a little of the above-mentioned Elector, princes and cities' unhappiness with many untruths, and that, so on and more, even at the same time and in the same way, and that, so further and more, also acted at the same time and besides, [should] be omitted, 1) but the things, as they would have been acted and proceeded on both sides, it would be to Glimpf or Unglimpf, from beginning to end, should be explained and given to day; as also to the poet, if he, together with his printer, has included the Imperial Highness and Majesty in his work. Highness and Majesty in his booklet, but rather has written it as a bad historian 2) outside of the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Science, the same has not otherwise befitted to describe the truth, also all actions on both sides completely, unmutated, and without such wide stag or hare jumps.

(6) And even if he pretends that he was not always present at all the acts, and especially what happened outside the public audience, for which reason he could not have described everything, this may not excuse him from being untruthful.

1161: Joh. Aurifaber's report of the Diet of Augsburg, and what happened to Luther and his teachings in 1530.

This account is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 160; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 524; and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 196.

1st Anno 1530, the 24th day of February, Emperor Carl was crowned in Italy at Bononia by the Pope, and from the same place he sent out notices to all the estates of the Roman Empire to hold an Imperial Diet, and to convene it at Augsburg on the 8th day of April.

(2) This Diet of Augsburg is twofold.

1) "should omit" put by us instead of: "omitted".

2) So put by us instead of: "but himself before a bad historian."

The reasons for the appointment were twofold. First, that the division in religion, which had arisen between the papists and the protesting estates many years ago, was to be settled. Secondly, because the Turk fell in Austria in the past 1529th year, with great war power, on the 21st day of September, and the Turkish army had been destroyed. Thereupon he stormed the city, but lost several storms before he did so. On the sixteenth day of October he set out from Vienna, set fire to his camp, and marched again to Hungary and Constantinople. Then there was great fear that in the thirtieth year the Turk would return and attack Germany. For this reason, at the Imperial Diet, it was decided to propose and take action for persistent help against the Turks.

3rd Duke John of Saxony, Elector, together with his Electoral son, Duke John Frederick, also Duke Ernest and Duke Franzen, brothers, Princes of Lüneburg and Brunswick, also Prince Wolf of Anhalt, together with a stately knighthood, arrived at Augsburg on the 2nd day of May, and was the first of all the princes and princes to appear at the Imperial Diet; which the papists had not provided for themselves. For they did not mean otherwise, S.C.F.G. would not attend the Diet, but would shun the light, so that their C.F.G. and their relatives would not be allowed to answer and give an account of their Christian doctrine and religion.

When the Elector of Saxony arrived in Augsburg on a Monday, their C. F. G. preached in the preacher's monastery of Magister Eisleben on the following Wednesday, and in the same monastery their C. F. G. heard God's word for a while. And when Landgrave Philip of Hesse arrived in Augsburg on the Thursday after Jubilate, their princely lords had them preach the following Friday in the monastery of St. Moritz by O. Erhard Schnepfen, and afterwards in St. Ulrich. Such preaching by the protesters has greatly annoyed the papists; therefore they have practiced so much with the emperor that their imperial majesty has sent a message to the Elector of Saxony out of pressure, and has earnestly requested that their electoral graces cease the preaching; as the preaching has since been stopped for them.

5th In the evening of the feast of Corporis Christi Emperor Carl rode in at Augsburg, and with their Imperial Majesty Campegius the Cardinal, the Pope's legate, arrived; and all the Electors are and princes, ecclesiastical and secular, rode to meet her Majesty and led her into the city. This evening, the Imperial Majesty again requested that they, the protesting estates, refrain from their preaching, and in the morning walk with Her Majesty in procession on the day of Corporis Christi. Both of these requests were denied to Her Imperial Majesty at that time for Christian reasons.

(6) On the day of Corporis Christi, the Imperial Majesty summoned the protesting princes and chieftains early and earnestly requested the above-mentioned two articles from them again. But they have rested on their negative answer, and have offered to give the reasons for their excuse in writings. Then the Imperial Majesty was moved with anger and disgrace against them, and nevertheless granted them to write their answer in a document and to hand it over to her Majesty. And Her Majesty, together with the Papist princes and churls, has performed the Procession Corporis Christi (as the same Papist festival is called).

(7) On the Friday after Corporis Christi, when the protesting churons and princes submitted such a document to the Imperial Majesty, Her Imperial Majesty submitted it to all the other churons and princes for consultation. When the latter now noted that Her Imperial Majesty would be displeased with the protesting estates, they asked Her Majesty to grant them action between Her Majesty and the protesting estates.

(8) And for this negotiation a committee was made among them, as the Archbishop of Cologne, Margrave Joachim the Younger, the Elector Palatine's Courtier, Duke George of Saxony, Duke Ludwig of Bavaria, and Duke Albrecht of Mecklenburg. Which, after negotiations had been held, finally proposed the means that all estates should be forbidden to preach in Augsburg for a time by the imperial majesty, and that also D. Faber, preacher of the royal dignity in Hungary, should not preach. On the other hand, her Majesty wanted to decree and appoint preachers who would preach the Gospel purely and peacefully. And should Her Imperial Majesty Majesty should then take the religious action in hand and hear and settle it amicably. So that the protesting estates were satisfied. And on the Saturday after Corporis Christi, an imperial herald and drummer abolished the preaching by publicly blowing the trumpets.

9th On the Monday after Corporis Christi, which was the twentieth day of June, the beginning of the Imperial Diet was held at Augsburg, and the Imperial Majesty had the proposition made, which was based on the two points: first, to declare the unity of the faith, and that each part should present its grievance in writing in Latin and German, the secular against the clergy, and the clergy against the secular. And the presentation has been politely arranged, so that the Elector of Saxony, nor other princes, nor D. Martini Lutheri, is thought to murder in it. Secondly, about the persistent help against the Turks. And the religious act was the first to be carried out. For the protesting estates did not want to agree to the act of the Turkish tax, unless the article concerning God's word and the Christian faith had been dealt with first.

(10) On the Saturday after the feast of St. John the Baptist, the protesting princes and princes, and the two cities of Nuremberg and Reutlingen, made a confession of their faith by 21. Philippum Melancthonem, publicly read before the Roman Emperor and King Ferdinand, as well as before all princes, princes and estates of the empire, ecclesiastical and secular, and offered to hand over an apologia and a more extensive explanation of it to the imperial majesty, princes and princes of the empire.

(11) And when this confession of faith was read out, Doctor Gregorius Brück, Saxon chancellor, wanted to hand over and deliver the copy of the confession, German and Latin, to the imperial secretary, Alexander Schweiß, and through him to the archbishop of Mainz. Then the Imperial Majesty himself took hold of it, and took the copy to him, with the gracious request of Duke Frederick, Count Palatine, to consider the matter further.

(12) The Imperial Majesty had this confession translated into French by Alexander Schweiß and, at the request of Cardinal Campegii, had it translated into French for the Pope by another of his secretaries. Such a confession was also immediately sent to the pope by mail. It was also sent to the King of France, the King of England, and the King of Portugal. And the imperial majesty of the pope and the other kings has sought and requested theologians eensurara and juäieium about it. Is therefore the protesting estates' confession as-soon been spread in the high potentates' courts.

(13) On the Sunday after St. John's Day, the imperial majesty sent a confession to the papist churl and princes of the protesting estates for consultation, who then submitted it to their theologians, who were Johannes Faber, D. Eck, D. Mensing, Cochläus, and others; these then made a confutation, and on Wednesday after St. Margaret's had it returned to the imperial majesty by the above-mentioned churl and princes. At that time, a papist prince said in the presence of other princes and lords: "The Lutherans have handed over a confession written in ink; if I were emperor, I would give them a confutation and a script with rubrics, that is, written in red ink. Immediately another prince answered that the emperor should nevertheless take care if he wanted to write with rubrics, so that the prisilgen 1) did not splash under his eyes.

(14) On the third day of August, the imperial majesty summoned all the princes and chieftains again, and had the confutation of the papists read to them by the secretary, Alexander Schweiß, which at first had been written very quickly, vehemently, and hatefully, to overbite the emperor with it, and had been written in two hundred sheets. But the imperial majesty himself had ordered to soften this and to shorten the writing a little, about which three weeks of time had passed. The protesting estates requested a copy of this confutation, but it was refused to them by the imperial majesty.

(15) When, after the reading of such a confutation, the emperor earnestly desired of the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen that they would rejoin the Roman church in doctrine and faith, and accept the confutation, they should have a gracious emperor; if not, their imperial majesty would not leave the Roman church with protection, and would punish those who planted repugnant doctrine. Thereupon Elector John of Saxony has for his person a very Christian and constant confession of his church doctrine and faith (whereby his electoral grace also wanted to remain in its pit, by divine grace and bestowal) to the Imperial Majesty in Latin, French and German on the evening of the Feast of the Assumption.

1) Otherwise, the form: "Presilgen" -Brazil, that is, red color.

16 Since the matter of the protesting estates was now approaching Augsburg in a very dangerous and painful manner, Landgrave Philip of Hesse let himself be led out of Augsburg at night through a gateway with a few horses on the 6th day of August, and rode off to the Hessian land. This has annoyed the Emperor, and therefore he has seriously ordered the Augsburg City Council not to let anyone out through the gateway at night. He also summoned the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen, and agreed with them that they would wait in Augsburg until the discussion of the religious matters and the end of the Diet. For their Majesty wanted to try all means and ways that might be useful for peaceful unity. The protesting estates then granted this.

(17) As a result, a number of princes and chieftains have presented themselves to the Imperial Majesty and requested further negotiations between Her Majesty and the protesting estates. So on the sixth day of August the other committee was appointed, in which were the two Electors of Mainz and Brandenburg, the Chancellor of the three Electors, Cologne, Treves, and Palatinate, and Mr. Georg Truchsess of Waldburg, Baron, on behalf of the House of Austria. Item, the bishop of Salzburg, Speier and Strasbourg. Also three secular princes, as Duke George of Saxony, Duke Henry of Brunswick, and Duke Albrecht of Mecklenburg. The Abbot of Weingarten, the Chancellor of Baden, and the Chancellor of the Duke of Jülich, who summoned the protesting estates to the Chapter House of the Augsburg Abbey, and negotiated with them for several days for a settlement in religion, and discussed the disputed articles with each other, but were unable to unite or settle.

(18) Then a small committee was appointed in the sixteenth day of August to see if a settlement could be reached beforehand, and seven persons were appointed on each side. On the papist side, the Bishop of Augsburg, Duke Henry of Brunswick, the Archbishop of Cologne, Elector, and Chancellor of the Margrave of Baden, and three theologians, Doctor Johann Eck, Doctor Johannes Wimpina, and Doctor Johannes Cochleus. On the protesting side there have also been two princes, as Margrave Georg of Brandenburg and Duke Johannes Friedrich of Saxony; two jurists, as D. Gregorius Brück, and D. Heller; then three theologians, as N. Philippus Melanchthon, Johannes Brentius, and Erhardus Schneppius. These came together, took the Augsburg Confession of the protesting estates before their hands, and conversed with each other from article to article, and the first day compared themselves in eleven articles. The next day they went on, and united with each other in twenty-one articles. But on the articles concerning the mass, the marriage of priests, the Lord's Supper, the monastic vows, and the jurisdiction of bishops, and others, they could not unite, but remained at odds.

(19) Therefore, on the 22nd day of August, the papists of the committee reported to the princes and lords of the realm what they had hitherto done and arranged, and suggested that unity would be achieved much more if few persons were used in the action than if this matter were to pass through many heads and hands. So it was considered good that a small committee was appointed, who also acted in unity. And on the Tuesday after the Assumption of Mary, Philippus Melanchthon, together with D. Gregorio Brücken and O. Heller, and on the papist side D. Eck, and the Bishop of Cologne, and the Chancellor of the Margrave of Baden were used. But since these six persons had talked and disputed with each other for a long time, they were not able to compare.

On the 20th of August last, the joint committee informed the sovereigns and princes of the empire of the opinion and will of the protesting estates, from which they could not deviate in any way or give in to anything. This was followed by all kinds of advice and proposals on how to reach a peaceful agreement. And on the seventh day of September 1) the Emperor summoned the papist and protesting estates to his presence, and himself negotiated with them, and offered to work with the pope so that a concilium could be favorably arranged, in which the religious schism and separation could be heard, judged, and resolved, and harmless concerns about a peaceful parting between the time and the concilium were made.

seß, Baron, and Doctor Vehus, Chancellor of Baden, the protesting estates 2) were asked how the religious matters were to be settled peacefully, or how they were to be given a hearing, or that one might come to a peaceful parting and end of the Reichstag.

22 When neither great promises, nor serious threats, nor clever tricks and practices could drive away and turn away the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen from the Christian doctrine and religion; as then the above-mentioned pieces were quickly tried against S. C. F. G. and the same kinsmen at Augsburg, and the Elector of Saxony broke away from Augsburg on the 18th day of September, and returned to his lands. C. F. G. and his kinsmen were attempted at Augsburg, and the Elector of Saxony wanted to leave Augsburg on the 18th day of September and depart again for his own lands, as if their Electoral Grace, at the Emperor's request, had not been able to do so. Grace remained there four days at the Emperor's request. And on the 22nd day of September, which was Thursday 3) Mauritius, the Imperial Majesty summoned all the estates of the empire together, and gave the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen their farewell, with gracious permission of a period of reflection between here and the first 4) day of April, Anno 1531, what they wanted to give the Imperial Majesty in reply.

23 And on the same day the Apologia on their confession was delivered to the Imperial Majesty by the protesters through D. Gregory Bridges. Gregory Bridges. The next day the Elector of Saxony departed from Augsburg, leaving his advisors there behind him.

(24) During the Diet of Augsburg, Martin Luther was in Coburg, and from there he gave advice and instruction to the Elector of Saxony and his theologians, and there he wrote many useful good books and had them printed. As, a letter to the Bishop of Mainz, Cardinal, together with an interpretation of the other Psalm. Admonition to the clergy, assembled at the Diet of Augsburg. Also interpretations of several Psalms, such as the 118th, the hundred and eleventh; item, the hundred and seventeenth; also many textbooks, such as, Admonition to Receive the Holy Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, item, of the Keys, of Matrimonial Matters, and How to Keep Children in School. Item, of Purgatory 2c.

25th On the eleventh day of November the final parting of the Diet to all Estates from the Quay is celebrated.

The Lord's Day has been given, and thus this Imperial Diet has had its finality, at which the teaching of the Gospel, revealed by God through D. Luther in these last days, has been publicly proclaimed before the Emperor, the King, and all the princes and rulers of the Empire. Luther in these last days of the world, was publicly confessed before the emperor, king, and all the princes and rulers of the empire; and what is written in the Psalms was fulfilled: "I spoke of your testimony before the kings, and was not ashamed. And the confession of our Christian faith was then delivered to the whole empire at this imperial diet, continued to come and spread, and many people became attached to it; it still exists to this day against the raging and fury of the world, the devil, and the gates of hell. And what this Augsburg Confession has done and worked, D. Martinus Luther once said about tables like this Tanta est Verbi Dei efficacia et virtus, ut, quo plus persecutionis habeat, eo plus floreat et crescat. Considerate comitia Augustana, quae vere sunt ultima tuba ante extremum diem. Quam aestuabat totus mundus tum contra nostram doctrinam. O how we had to pray that Christ would remain [safe] from the papists in heaven! Tandem nostra doctrina et fides ita prodiit in lucem per confessionem nostram, ut brevissimo tempore, mandato etiam Caesaris, ad omnes reges et principes mitteretur; ibi multa praeclarissimorum virorum ingenia in aulis fuerunt, die fingen diese Lehre gleich wie ein Zunder [et postea ubique incendebant].<sup>2)</sup> Ita nostra confessio et apologia<sup>3)</sup> in summa gloria est edita. At illorum confutatio in tenebris sordescit. O quam optarim, ut ipsorum confutatio in lucem prodiret; How would we set about the old torn fur, and so shake it, that the spots should thrust to and fro? Sed ipsi orunt lucem. They will not come hither. We have offered them peace and unity enough. Sed ipsi superbissime nolebant consentire. Ideo oportet papistas perire sine ulla misericordia. Sicut in Josua [cap. 9,15.] legitur, quod Josua omnibus civitatibus pacem obtulerit, et nullam praeter Gabaon pacem

2) Inserted after Lösche.

3) Apologia is here another name for the Augsburg Confession, which was initially called a Schutzschrift. The "Apology of the Augsburg Confession" was not accepted by the Emperor.

suscepisse, caeteras omnes eam excussisse, et ideo sine misericordia periisse. Ideo nostra<sup>4)</sup> illa comitia omni laude digna sunt. What has been consumed there, let no one regret, quia Verbum Dei divulgatum est passim contra omnium hominum, Caesaris, papae et Epicureorum opinionem. They wanted to dampen our doctrine by force, but then it began to rise.

27. at this Augsburg Diet O. Martin Luther's father, Hans Luther, citizen in the valley of Mansfeld, died blessedly in God.

(28) During the Imperial Diet of Augsburg, some of the cities of Upper Austria, which had adhered to Zwingli's and Oekolampadi's doctrine of the Lord's Supper, submitted to the Imperial Majesty and the Estates of the Empire their own confession on this article. Majesty and the Estates of the Empire their own confession on this article. For the protesting estates have therefore been at odds with them; as Martinus Bucer, preacher at Strasbourg, has sent from Augsburg to D. Martin Luther against Coburg, to discuss it with him, and whether an agreement could be reached in it, which then followed in 1536.

In the month of November the Imperial Majesty departed from Augsburg together with King Ferdinand and other princes. Majesty of Augsburg, together with King Ferdinand and other princes, departed for Cologne, whither her Imperial Majesty required all seven princes by writing on the 21st day of December to elect a Roman king there. Maj. summoned all seven Electors by writing on the 21st day of December to elect a Roman King there. This election was contested by Prince John of Saxony, who publicly protested against it through his son, Duke John Frederick. Hence the beginning of all displeasure, enmity, and bitterness of the House of Austria against the Elector of Saxony and his son, Duke John Frederick.

On the 22nd day of December, the protesting estates held a meeting at Schmalkalden. And there a covenant and agreement was made among them. They also challenged the election of the Roman king by writing to the emperor.

1162 Luther's letter to the Elector John because of the violent writings forbidden to him. April 16, 1531.

The original of this letter is in the archives at Weimar. U6A. X. fol. 73. afterwards in the Leipzig Supplement, p. 66, No. III; in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 238 and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 54, p. 223. We have used the variants given in Burkhardt, p. 190.

4) nostra is missing from Lösche.

I. Grace and peace in Christ! Most Serene, Most Reverend Prince, Most Gracious Lord! The respectable, most reverend Lord, D. Gregorius Brück, has notified me of E. C. F. G.'s writing and order to forbid me the violent, sharp writings, of which I recently let two go out, so that incorrectness 1) may be prevented: in addition, I have also seen two shameful letters written to the monastery of Rissau from Wittenberg under the name "M. L.". L.", 2) whereupon I am also compelled to report my humble opinion to E. C. F. G..

(2) First, I myself can testify with these two sharp writings that I do nothing rebellious in them, nor will any man prove rebellion to me from them, and I will (whether God wills it) keep the same against everyone.

(3) Secondly, it is also clear that I have praised and extolled Imperial Majesty to the highest degree. Maj. to the highest degree, and in sum, as the words clearly state, 3) to instruct nothing but the consciences in a Christian manner, and to discover the evil practices of the abusers of the Imperial name, so that pious hearts may be unconcerned and unharmed. name, so that pious hearts may remain unconcerned and unaffected.

(4) Thirdly, how Christianly and honestly E. C. F. G. and her relatives have acted in such an edict, I think E. C. F. G. should feel better than all the world, and have also made it well known in Augsburg with objections and protests.

(5) Because that part nevertheless condemned our matters and, continuing with the head, neither wanted to hear nor to answer, did not pay attention to anything about that, that one so highly, heartily, earnestly asked for peace, nevertheless omitted such a sinister, cruel, bloodthirsty, false edict, and thereby (to tell the truth) drew the sword against E. C. F. G. and the same relatives, and put the whole realm in armour, as one cannot interpret such otherwise; and that is even more, E. C. F. G. and the same relatives have been in a state of panic. C. F. G. and her relatives, and put the whole realm in armour, as one cannot interpret such otherwise; and that is even more, E. C. F. G. together with her relatives have been kept in such a state for more than half a year.

1) In the old edition: "a correctness".

2) The two letters are printed by Burkhardt, p. 190. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XX, introduction, p. 22 d.

3) Walch: Christian.

and such dangerous and miserable patience proved all too great an excess, and yet did nothing with that part, but only made them more defiant, more proud, and more wanton, so that I had to worry that they would not stop, that they would cause misery. Therefore, whether E. C. F. G. and her relatives wanted to remain silent and suffer forever in this matter, it has not been my intention to remain silent nor to suffer for a long time, as the matter is initially and most nobly my own. For if I should finally keep silent about such a public condemnation of my doctrine, it would be just as much as if I abandoned it and denied it; before I want to do that and suffer, I want to incur the wrath of all the devils, of all the world, before I keep silent because of the mob 4).

(6) That perhaps some pretend with E. C. F. G., the two writings are sharp and swift, that is truly true; nor did I write it to be blunt and mild, and I alone am sorry that [it] is not sharper and fiercer; for whoever sees or notices the sharpness and swiftness of the trade on that part, will not count my writing for special sharpness and swiftness, unless that would be a mild and gentle trade, that one over E. C. F. G. together with her relatives should deny such a gruesome edict and condemnation of unheard-of 5) matter. C. F. G. together with her relatives such an atrocious edict and condemnation of unheard-of 5) matter and denied answer to be let out publicly, and thus the whole empire's sword and fury in E. C. F. G. life and limb, and to make Germany full of innocent blood, widows, orphans, and to disturb and devastate the whole realm.

(7) Yes, my writing can be regarded as sharp and vehement; but when will that part also once take itself by the nose and judge your writing to be sharp? When has ever Imperial Maj. Maj. punished or forbade the writings that have gone out against us in the whole Empire, also in his hereditary lands and in the French lands, in the most severe and disgraceful manner without intermission? When did King. Maj. of Bohemia too harshly damned D. Faber's and the like lying, blasphemous, ass-like

4) Walch: "aller kaiserlichen Rätthe"; DeWette: "der kaiserlichen Rätthe".

Scripture? When did the Dukes of Bavaria punish or rebuke D. Ecken and other writings full of lies and blasphemy in the most bitter way? When did Margrave Joachim punish his Wimpina and Mensingen, the poisonous vipers and liars? When has Duke Georgen ever been displeased by what Emser, Doctor Cochleus, and many others in his lands have written so sharply, bitterly, and shamefully against us? Therein also the tender, pious prince, Duke Frederick himself, honors not a little touched, I will keep silent, how E. C. F. G. is mischievous and bruised with it. Duke George himself has written against me, and many times so, that a loose Emser or Notzlöffel should be ashamed to write so; but it should not be given to him either.

(8) From this E. C. F. G. sees that the opinion of such people is that if a hundred thousand wrote on that part, yes, if all the leaves and grass wrote and cried against us in the most poisonous and bitter, most shameful and lying way 1) and we kept silent and said yes to it, that would be right and fine. But if I alone, poor man, should cry out against so many monstrous wonders and abominations, no one has written sharply except Luther alone. Yes, if that be right, that they may pretend: Let us write and cry out most flagrantly against you and your doctrine, and be silent, and say yes to it; let us drive upon the Elector of Saxony with edicts, bats, and guns of the whole realm, but he hold our peace and say that it is right: who would not like to be judged, most gracious lord? They are certainly not silly people, but attack it very wisely!

(9) Accordingly, my most humble request to E. C. F. G. is that they do not allow evil mouths to be moved against me, and from the indicated causes consider the great unavoidable need that has urged me to write sharply, so E. C. F. G. will well judge that I am much, much too blunt and soft with my writing to such evil knots and branches. But if this is not enough, let them write against me or sue me in writing, where I have acted rebelliously or unjustly; if I will not answer for it, then I will suffer my right to do so.

far that I do not want to have told them nor advised them to do such against me, because I did not write it drunk nor in sleep. The other two letters to the abbess at Rissau see E. C. F. G. himself that they are not mine, so I know neither monastery nor abbots inside, do not know where it lies, whether they eat or drink inside. Although a great deal of shameful writing has gone out against us from Duke George's country, and yet 2) everything has been done well, namely by Hasenberger in Leipzig, which our enemies also spit upon, it is so exceedingly shameful. He still walks in Leipzig, and has a gracious lord, praise and honor, along with his followers. But this is the sum of it: what we speak and do is wrong, if we wake up the dead; what they do is right, and if they drown land and people with innocent blood; and such people should be attacked with cotton, courted, and said: Mercy-junior, ye are pious and fair. The merciful Father in heaven comfort and strengthen E. C. F. G. in his word and command until the blessed end, Amen. Sunday after Easter Day [April 16] 1531.

Olariissimo viro,

Doetori ot Laxoniao Louatori, suo in Domino mu^ori.

Mercy and peace, my dear Lord and Godfather! That my little book should come to Dresden before to Torgau, I should excuse [against] 3) you, so I hope it is not necessary. For E. A. was too long outside, as I had provided for E. A.'s future. So

2) Walch and De Wette: thereafter.

3) Inserted by us for ease of understanding.

I also think that my little books, if they should come to the court first, they would find so much of the master that nothing would ever come of it, and make countless other people suspicious of me. But now they see only Lutheran, and everyone can excuse himself that he did nothing to it.

(2) Well, I will still spare the bishop; I cannot do it even now that I write, and must forgive other writing. But I am surprised that the good man...

1) It might want to be read: "with the master" or: "with the master". Only with this or a similar reading does the following sentence seem to give us a corresponding sense.

D. Johann Rühel, lets again so fool to believe the loose and false man 2) since he knows that nothing good is behind.

(3) I have asked E. A. through Er Johann to help me finish the book of assassinations, for I want to work on it again; but I know little of the point, since it deals with the duke of Wittenberg. Theologically I want to do it, but to do it historically would be very useful to me.

I will do what is dear to E. A., if they are not slow in exhorting. Hereby commanded to God, amen. Ootava Nai 1531.

IV, p.4 (datirt of April 22) and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VII, p. 305.

Newly translated from the Latin.

3) Walch and De Wette: "the 22nd", which is not permissible, since the Uebersiedelung of Luther on the fortress Coburg happened in the night from April 22nd to 23rd. Köstlin, Martin Luther (3.), vol. II, p. 652 aa p. 198, 2, first called attention to this. The Erl. Briefwechsel brings still further evidence for it.

Grace and peace in Christ Jesus! At last we sit here among the clouds, and in truth in the kingdom of the birds, dearest Jonas. For to say nothing of the other birds, whose song is so great that it drowns the storm, the jackdaws or ravens take up a whole grove just before our eyes. "I mean, there is a gekecke," 4) from four o'clock in the morning 5) on, all day long tirelessly and incessantly, and perhaps all night long, so that I believe that there is hardly a larger crowd of birds gathered anywhere. There is not one among them that is silent but a moment, lest we should be compelled to hear each one perkily, as the elder with the younger, the mothers with the daughters, praise the name of jackdaws. They may sing so sweetly to lull us to sleep, which, God willing, we shall know this night. It is a very noble race of birds, and to the commonwealth (as you know) exceedingly necessary and useful. I interpret it in such a way that the whole army of Sophists and Cochleites from all over the world is gathered before me, so that I may become better acquainted with their wisdom and this sweet song, and view with pleasure their service and benefit both in the physical and in the spiritual community. So far no one has heard a nightingale, 1) while its precentor and accompanist, the cuckoo, praises in the glorious ornament of its voice, as befits a victor 2) in the public battles and victorious opponents of the nightingale, in the same way also the other fellow singers of the same, the blackbirds, warblers and larks cheerfully praise the Lord. This is something quite unheard of here. You see that I have nothing to write about; therefore, in order not to write anything, I would rather joke than remain silent, especially since the jackdaws are screaming so loudly and filling heaven and earth with their cackling. It seemed shameful to me that one who can speak words did not even dare to murmur. The Lord is with you, and let us pray for one another. That is necessary. Give my regards to Magister Agricola and Aquila, to whom I will write especially as soon as possible. Farewell. From the realm of birds, especially jackdaws, 1530.

4) In this the Erl. Briefwechsel alludes to Eck; but here Luther seems to us to speak only of the natural birds; only afterwards does he interpret it of the Sophists and people like Cochläus.

5)                      At                      this                      hour                      Luther                      arrived                      there.

Your Martin Luther.

1166. d. Matt. Luther's joke writing to his table companions in Wittenberg, of the jackdaws and crows Reichstag, behind which is nevertheless a great seriousness. April 28, 1530.

Handwritten in the Ooä. 6otti. L. 28, toi. 72; in the Ooä. 4oii. L. 246, toi. 218; in Copenhagen, iVik. 1393, toi. 209. Printed in the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. The address is found only in the manuscripts. On the other hand, the date offered in the same, "the 22nd of April," is wrong. See the previous number.

1) In the next letter to his table companions Luther reports that on April 28th the first nightingale was heard.

2) In the Erlanger Briefwechsel, in the explanation of the word tisroniess, probably by a misprint: "singer" 2c.

My dear table companions, Petro and Hieronymo Weller and Heinrich Schneidewin and others at Wittenberg, all and especially.

Grace and peace in Christ, dear lords and friends! I have received all your letters, and have heard them as they are due everywhere. In order that you may hear again, as is the case here, I would like you to know that we, namely I, Magister Veit and Cyriacus? do not go to the Diet in Augsburg; but we have otherwise come to another Diet.

(2) There is a rubet (4) just outside our window, like a little forest, where the jackdaws and the crows have laid down an imperial day; there is such a riding to and fro, such a shouting day and night, without ceasing, as if they were all drunk, full, and mad; there young and old are scuffling about one another, that I wonder how voice and breath can last so long. And I would like to know if there are some of these nobles and travellers still with you; methinks they are gathered here from all over the world.

(3) I have not yet seen their emperor, but otherwise the nobles and the great men are always hovering and dandling before our eyes; not almost exquisitely dressed, but simple in one color, all alike black, and all alike gray-eyed; all sing alike one song, but with lovely difference of the young and the old, great and small. Nor do they regard the great palace and hall; For their hall is vaulted with the fair wide sky, Their floor is vain field, paneled with pretty green branches, So the walls are as wide as the world's end. Nor do they ask for horses and armour; they have feathered wheels, that they may flee from their guns, and sit down to wrath. They are great and mighty lords, but what they will do I know not yet.

004 But as I have heard from an interpreter, they are about to make a mighty war against wheat, barley, oats, malt, 5) and all manner of corn and grain.

3) Veit Dietrich and Cyriacus Kaufmann.

4) "Rubet" (rul)(Kuin), a dense copse. In the previous letter: n "rnn8.

5) Of which the name "Malztürken" at the end of this letter.

and many a knight shall become here, and do great deeds.

005 So we sit here in the Diet, and listen and watch with great delight and love, how the princes and lords, together with the other estates of the realm, sing and live so merrily. But we have special joy when we see how chivalrously they play truant, wipe their beaks, and overthrow the army, so that they win and gain honor against grain and malt. We wish them good luck and good fortune, that they might all be impaled on a fence post.

006 But I hold that there is nothing else, but the Sophists and Papists, with their preaching and their writing, I must have them all in a heap before me, that I may hear their sweet voice and their preaching, and see how very useful a people it is to consume all that is on the earth, and to make merry for boredom.

Today we heard the first nightingale, because it did not want to trust April. So far the weather has been delicious, it has never rained, except a little yesterday. Perhaps it will be different with you. Hiemit GOtt commanded, and keep well house. From the Diet of the Maltese Turks , April 28, 1530.

With the date given by us in the Erlang correspondence, vol. VII, p. 307; the original printed there is without date.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the dear man, Mr. Georg Spalatin, the faithful servant of Christ in the Gospel, his superior.

Grace and peace in the Lord! It is not you alone, my dear Spalatin, who have come to the We, too, soon arrived at a Diet, just as we left you, and thus preceded you by far. And our journey to the Diet has not been hindered at all, but only changed. You are going to Augsburg, of course, but uncertain when you will see the beginning of your Imperial Diet; we have arrived here in the midst of the Imperial Diet. Here you may see noble kings, dukes, and other great men of the realm, earnestly caring for affairs and dependents, and shouting their resolutions and doctrines through the air with a tireless voice. Yea, they dwell not, or rather are not shut up, in such holes and caves as are at court, which ye call palaces, yet not with great goods, but in the open air, so that the sky itself serves them for a ceiling, and the greening trees are their exceedingly richly and variously panelled floor; moreover, the walls are at the same time also the ends of the earth. Then they also despise the foolish expenditure of gold and silk, but they all have the same manner, the same color, the same manner and speech, and are clothed with incredible similarity and equality. All are alike all black, all have dark-coloured eyes, all are unanimous in the same music, but with a sweet difference between the voices of the old and the young. Their emperor I have not yet seen nor heard. I see that they also despise the four-footed cavalry, since they have a better, winged one, by which they can also escape the wrath of the guns. As far as I have been able to hear from the interpreter of their resolutions, they have unanimously decided to wage war this whole year against barley, both raw and dried, then against winter and summer wheat, and everything else that is good grain. And there is danger that they will gain the victory in many things, for they are a crafty and cunning kind of warriors, wonderfully skilled in stealing and robbing. At this Diet we sit here with great pleasure as idle spectators and listeners.

1) By moving from the city of Coburg to the Feste.

For besides that the common and beautiful Moorish color delights us exceedingly, seeing that these heroes are so splendidly dressed, so also the unanimous singing of all, interspersed with beautiful modulations, delights us exceedingly. Then the hope and expectation of their bravery and the victories which we assume they will win over the wheat and the barley (and other such things) makes these fathers of the fatherland and preservers of the commonwealth exceedingly pleasant and endearing to us, so that, if something could be done with wishes, we would wish them to be rid of that ignominious name "jackdaws" (Noneäulurum), or rather of the reproach that they are thieves, and to be praised with expressions worthy of their virtue, that is, that they were all together spitted or speared (but in a suffering sense). But, if they could find a cheap interpreter, they would have enough honor and praise from their own name Non Läulue, as it were "Man Edel," or with a transposition of the words: "Edelman"; only that here an insult of your Reichstag is in view, where your noblemen (Läelmani) distinguish themselves too much by Dohlentugeud. However, our Läulini at their Imperial Diet have the advantage that they have a smaller and more tolerable court (Lorum) than yours at Augsburg will have.

This is enough for a joke, but a serious and necessary joke, which should drive away my thoughts, if it would drive them away. The rest you will learn from Jonas and Philip. From the realm of the winged jackdaws at five o'clock, D 1530. Yours, Martin Luther.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord John Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my gracious Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ JEsu! Sublime, highborn prince, gracious lord! E. F. G. sees before his eyes what kind of a lord the devil is, who leads such great wise people captive in fine service, and performs all fine deeds with crafty and cunning trickery. And although I know that E. F. G. is well equipped against this (praise God!), and know and judge all their great art and advice, I still, out of other concern, want to write to E. F. G. to humbly admonish them that they do not let themselves be annoyed by the poisonous, evil tricks that their closest blood friends are up to. For where the devil can do no more, he works to make our hearts wrong, and to provoke us to vexation with his unpleasant attempts. A good remedy for this is the seventh and thirtieth Psalms, which finely show how evil the devil's mind is, and lead us to trouble.

If he should tear out any word, work, or deed, that he might disgrace us as disobedient and rebellious, let him provoke patience without ceasing. But it is written, "If God be with us, who shall be against us?" And we must learn to eat into ourselves the deceitfulness of evil men, as Saint Paul says Rom. 12: "Overcome evil with good."

It is true that the Emperor is a pious heart, worthy of all honor and virtue, who may not receive too much honor on account of his person; but, dear God! what can a man do against so many devils, if God does not help mightily? It vexes me myself that E. F. G.'s blood friends do it so wantonly, and scrape so; but I must have patience, otherwise I would much rather wish them this and that. How much more can I think that E. F. G. would more cheaply destroy and move. But for the sake of God and the dear Emperor, E. F. G. will have patience, and will also pray with us for the wretched people; after all, they have not yet made it out. If I was wrong here in saying that E. F. G. would be annoyed by the evil treachery of his friends, I am glad, and E. F. G. wants to give me some patience and pray with us for the wretched people. F. G. will forgive me; for I mean it heartily well, sit here and think: this will go to the heart of this one, that one will go to the heart of that one, or make me unamused, because I am the devil of all malice without ceasing. E. F. G. be hereby graciously commanded by God, Amen. Given at Coburg on the last day of June, Anno 1530.

Grace and peace in Christ our Lord! I also believe, my dearest Spalatin, that the goodness of the emperor is great, as you all praise him. But I have no hope that

...that he will be favourable to our cause, though he may wish it. For what can one man do against so many devils? Therefore the Lord is our refuge, who is mighty in weakness, and is pleased to comfort the fainthearted, and to help the forsaken. But I have strong thoughts about what may have happened to you in the meantime, according to your last letters, and I make assumptions, supposing that the matter has long since come to a decision, and that you are not only condemned, but also suffer threats and wanton behavior. For it is to be wondered at what victories the adversaries are blasting out of Augsburg, that they would already have trampled us under foot and made us a laughingstock. But be of good cheer, saith the Lord, I have overcome the world: he that dwelleth in heaven shall laugh at them. Thus think I upon the matter. For we shall not be helped, we feien but forsaken before. "Blessed are ye (saith he), when men persecute you, and speak all evil against you, if they lie against it" 2c. We have taken upon us the ministry of which it is said, "Ye shall be hated of all men for my sake." And now we wonder that there is this hatred which has been foretold by Him who has such great credibility and standing? If we would that this prophecy were void, we should either not have taken this office upon us, or should have taken care that this should not be prophesied. For since it is foretold, and we have taken the ministry upon us, we are too tardy to think it vain and vain, and to desire to merit the favor and grace of men. Therefore may this prophecy be fulfilled, and we feel such hatred as may justly and not in jest be called a hatred. For the Scripture must not only become true, but must be fulfilled, become full, full, full, "that it may be called fulfilled, and full, full fulfilled." I am glad to hear of Duke George, that he is acting in this way; God will pay him with the nonsense of which he is worthy, and will add other plagues. May the Lord comfort and strengthen you all. Newly translated from the Latin.

To Georg Spalatin, the servant and faithful confessor of Christ, who is now in Augsburg, and who is to be highly honoured in the Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ! First of all, I must thank you, especially you, my dear Spalatin, that you write to us so diligently and abundantly, as you have material (ivuteriuiv) and sufficient (suKeiontos) causes, or rather abundant both formal and final (tiuulos) and effectual (oEeiontes) 1) causes. We are hermits here, and as it were a land without water; we can produce nothing worthy to be written to you, except that we go up to heaven with sighs, supplications, and with all power of prayer and offering, and, though unworthy, knock at the door of him that hath said, "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." All that is necessary is that we persevere and wait a little while.

Oh, friends,

You have suffered greater hardships, but God will soon put an end to them,
Just hold on faithfully, save yourselves for better times?)

Or rather this word, [Ps. 27:14, 31:25:] "Harvest ye the LORD, be ye confident and undaunted, all ye that wait for the LORD." [Hab. 2:3:] "Though he be consumed, wait ye, he will surely come, and the prophecy will not lie." Verily I see that ye are in the battle, and what devils shall ye not hear speaking most venomously in the answer of the adversaries? For I foresee all this now; but it does not mean so much. For since Christ hath already given the goods which this world comprehendeth not, and hath promised much greater things, why should do we not suffer this little evil, that the unclean flies stain us with their proboscis, or soil us a little, since of the natural flies even the highest and most beautiful queens are compelled to suffer this in the midst of their faces? But what are these angry people but buzzing flies that rush with their wings against our heads? But after they have swished very angrily, they give forth an outrage that one can hardly hit with a needle. So great is the power of so great a rage. But ours is the forgiveness of sins, salvation from death, eternal life; Christ himself is ours with all that is his, for whose name you now sweat. He will not forsake his cause; and if he forsake it, it would be beautiful and salutary to be forsaken with him, though he were not GOD. But I carry wood into the forest. Greetings M. Eisleben, Aquila, Brenz, and all ours. Christ is with you. From the desert of Gruboc, July 20, 1530, your Martin Luther.

1184 Veit Dietrich's letter to Melanchthon, in which he holds up to him Luther's example of faithful trust and zeal in prayer. July 30, 1530.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 430; in the Jena (1566) vol. V, p. 117; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 244, and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 188.

To his dear Preceptori, Philippo Melanchthoni, Vitus Dietrich wishes good luck.

Dear Mr. Philippe, You do not know how distressed I am because of your health. But I beg you, for Christ's sake, not to regard so lightly the letter written to you by the Doctor. I cannot sufficiently marvel at his excellent constancy, joy, faith and hope in these miserable times. But such things he daily multiplieth.

He is a man of diligence in the practice of God's word. Not a day goes by in which he does not take at least three hours, which are most convenient for study, for prayer.

(2) Once I heard him pray. Help God! What a spirit, what faith is in his words. He prays so devoutly as one who speaks with God, with such hope and faith, as one who speaks with his father. I know (he said) that thou art our beloved God and Father, therefore I am sure that thou wilt destroy the persecutors of thy children. But if thou wilt not, the journey is thine as well as ours; the whole matter is thine: what we have done, that must we do: therefore, dear father, thou mayest protect them.

(3) When I heard him pray such words with a loud voice from afar, my heart burned with great joy, because I heard him speak so kindly and devoutly to God; but especially because he pressed so hard on the promises from the Psalms, as if he were sure that everything he desired must come to pass. Therefore I have no doubt that his prayer will be of great help in this lost matter, which will be dealt with at the present Diet.

004 I would that the Salzburg doeg, the Edomite, had all misfortune, because he hath afflicted you so. The Lord Doctor said: had he been in your stead, he would have answered him thus: If your emperor will not suffer the destruction of the empire, neither will our emperor suffer blasphemy. Only defy your emperor with confidence, and we will also defy ours, and see who will prevail.

(5) You, my dear preceptor, would do much better if you followed the doctor in this case. For with your sorrowful care and useless weeping you will do nothing but cause a great misfortune to yourselves and to all of us (for whom nothing is dearer or more useful than your salvation). I pray diligently for you and for all of you, as much as I can.

(6) May our God, who is condemned by ungodly people, destroy the nations that desire war and save us, his poor army, from the terrible hand that seeks murder and our blood, amen. Now, dear Mr. Preceptor, God keep you most blessedly in our Lord Christ, and do not charge me with my letter, for you know my heart toward you. God bless you once again. Given from our desert, July 30, 1530.

This letter is handwritten in the 60d. den. d. toi. 306. printed by Chyträus, p. 96d; in des Flacius deutscher Sammlung, no. 4; in the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1569) vol. IX, p. 423d; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, bl. 119d; in the Altenburger, vol. V, p. 246; in the Leipziger, vol. XX, p. 182; in the Erlanger, vol. 54, p. 183, and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 127. Latin in Buddeus, x". 172 and in Golsstius, tom. II, fol. 275.

To the respectable, highly esteemed Mr. Gregorio Brück, the Right Doctor, Electoral Chancellor of Saxony and Councillor, my favourable lord and friendly dear godfather.

1. grace and peace in Christ. Esteemed, most reverend, dear Lord and Godfather! I have now written several times to my most gracious Lord, and to ours, that I think I have done too much, especially to my most gracious Lord, as if I doubted that God's comfort and help would be more and stronger with S. C. F. G. than with me. But I did it because of the suggestion of our people, some of whom are so wistful and careful, as if God had forgotten us, if he cannot forget us, he must first forget himself. Unless our cause were not his cause, and our doctrine not his word. Otherwise, if we are certain of this, and do not doubt that it is his cause and his word, then our prayer has certainly been heard, and help has already been decided upon, and prepared, so that we may be helped; this cannot fail. For he saith, Can a woman forget her child, that she should not have mercy on the fruit of her womb? Though she forget her own, yet will I not forget thee: behold, I have marked thee upon mine hand."

002 I saw two wonders the other day: The first, when I looked out at the window, and saw the stars of heaven, and all the goodly vault of God; and yet I saw no pillars anywhere, whereon the Master had set such a vault; neither yet did the heavens fall, nor yet did such a vault stand fast. Now there are some who seek such pillars, and would gladly take hold of them and feel them. Because they are not able to do so, they wriggle and tremble, as though the heavens are sure to fall, for no other reason than that they do not grasp the pillars or see them. If they could grasp them, the heavens would stand firm.

003 And another thing, I saw also great clouds hovering over us, with such a weight, that they might be likened unto a great sea; and yet I saw no ground whereon they rested, or whereon they footed, nor any runners wherewith they were bound; neither yet did they fall upon us, but greeted us with a sour countenance, and fled away. When they were past, there shone forth both the ground and our roof, which had held them, the rainbow. But it was a faint, thin, small ground and roof, that it disappeared in the clouds, and was more a shadow (as it is wont to shine through a painted glass), than such a mighty ground to look upon, that one should despair so much even of the ground, as of the great load of water. Nevertheless, it was indeed found that such a faint (to look at) shadow carried the water load and protected us. There are still some who regard, respect, and fear the thickness and weight of the water and the clouds more than this thin, narrow, and light sheath, because they would like to feel the power of this sheath; but because they cannot, they fear that the clouds will cause an everlasting flood.

(4) I must jest with your respectability, and yet write unjokingly; for I have had special joy in experiencing how E. A., above all others, has good courage and a brave heart in this challenge of ours. I had hoped it would have been the least pax politia to obtain; but God's thoughts are far above our thoughts. And is also right, for he (saith Sanct Paul sEph. 3:20.)) heareth and doeth supra ^uam inteHiZiMU8 ant potimus. For we know not how to ask, Rom. 8:26. If therefore he should hear us, as we ask, that Caesar should give us peace, it might be said, inkra, not supra ^uani intelliZimus, and probably Caesar, and not GOD, should get the glory.

005 But now he himself will make peace for us, that he alone may have the glory which is his alone.

is due. Not that we hereby despise Imperial Majesty. Majesty, but ask and wish that Imperial Majesty do nothing against God and imperial rights. Majesty will do nothing against God and imperial rights. If, however, she does so (since God is in favor), we, as the loyal subjects, do not want to believe that [it is] His Imperial Majesty who does so. Majesty, but think that other tyrants do it under the name of Imperial Majesty. Majest. do it, and therefore kaiserl. Majesty. Majesty's name and the work of the tyrants, just as we also distinguish God's name which heretics and liars use, and honor God's name and avoid lies. Thus, we should not and cannot approve of the actions of tyrants, nor should we assume that they will be punished under Imperial Majesty. Majesty's Imperial Majesty's name.

006 But such work as God has graciously given us, He will bless and promote by His Spirit, and will well choose the time and place to help us, and will not forget it yet.

...miss. They have not yet half brought it, the viri sanAurium, which they have now begun, are not all home again, or where they would like to be. Our rainbow is faint, their clouds are mighty; but in Lns viäsbitor 6uju8 wni. Your respectability give me credit for my talk, and comfort Magistrum Philippum and all the rest. Let Christ also comfort and keep me our most gracious Lord. To whom be praise and thanks forever and ever, amen. Whose grace I also faithfully commend to E. A. Lx Lroino, 5th AuA. Anno 1530.

The Fourteenth Chapter.

About the meetings of the Protestants at Schmalkalden and the so-called Schmalkaldic League, also about the very first religious peace concluded thereafter.

First paragraph.

Of two meetings of the Protestants at Schmalkalden and the alliance established there, and what has happened in the meantime because of the election of Ferdinand as Roman king.

1187. farewell of the first convention at Schmalkalden, at which a rotel of a covenant was conceived and immediately approved and accepted by some estates. Given the 31st of December, Anno 1530.

From Hortleders Ursachen des deutschen Kriegs, tom. I, INJ. 8, 6ux>. 7, S. 1322.

1. as the most illustrious, noble, highborn princes and lords, lord john, duke of saxony, of the holy roman empire archduke of saxony, of the holy roman empire archduke of saxony, of the holy roman empire archduke of saxony. marschall und Churfürst, Herr Ernst, Herzog zu Braunschweig und Lüneburg, Herr Philipp, Landgraf zu Hessen, und Herr Wolfgang, Fürst zu Anhalt 2c., of his own person; also of the noble and highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg, appointed councillors; likewise the well-born and noble, Lord Gebhard and Lord Albrecht, Counts and Lords of Mansfeld, of their own person, for themselves; and then Count Albrecht, of Duke Philippsen of Brunswick, on account of himself; also of the subsequently named honorable, free imperial and other cities' messengers, and of the noble and highborn, Lord Philipps of Brunswick.

The following cities, namely Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Constance, Ulm, Magdeburg, Bremen, Reutlingen, Heilbronn, Memmingen, Lindau, Kempten, Isni, Bibrach, Windsheim, and Weissenburg am Nordgau, have recently come here to Schmalkalden in the matters of our holy faith at Augsburg for the sake of the arduous treaty with the empire, and for the sake of all their electoral and princely graces. They have talked and united with each other for the sake of the points and pieces mentioned hereafter.

2. And namely, first, the said my most gracious and gracious lords, electors and princes, also the two counts of Mansfeld, who have been assembled here in their own persons, and then the cities of Strasbourg, Ulm, Magdeburg and Bremen, Reutlingen and Heilbronn, have sent messages for themselves, and as rulers of the other cities of the upper country, of a Christian understanding for the resistance and rescue of a mighty invasion, and put up a note, which was immediately granted and accepted by the princes, counts, and the two cities of Magdeburg and Bremen; In which, however, some of the said cities are to sign or copy, as they know, namely in six weeks, the next after the date of this decree, to the Elector of Saxony. Since, however, our gracious Lord Margrave George of Brandenburg's appointed councillors, as well as the envoys from Nuremberg, Windsheim and Weissenburg, have had no command in this matter, they have neither been able nor willing to do anything about it outside their gracious lords and friends.

3. Therefore our most gracious and gracious lords, as reported above, are of the will and mind to request our gracious lord Margrave George and the people of Nuremberg by messages or writings with a Christian good report, on account of other Christian states, in the consoling confidence that our gracious lord, Margrave George, and those of Nuremberg, together with the cities of Windsheim and Weissenburg, will thereupon settle such a matter with the aforementioned our most gracious and gracious lords, also the counts and other estates, in a friendly and benevolent manner.

(4) Secondly, all the above-mentioned lords and princes, including the counts, and then our gracious Lord Margrave Georgen, as well as the embassies of the honorable free cities and imperial towns, have agreed to send a letter to the Roman imperial majesty to mediate the arduous parting, as much as imperial majesty's fiscal process involves, and to send the same letter from here to the imperial majesty. Majesty's Fiscal Proceß, in peace, and to do the same writing from here to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty, also besides more thought of our most gracious and gracious lords, the Elector of Saxony, also Margrave Georgen of Brandenburg, and the Landgrave of Hesse, and then of the Nuremberg Council's embassies, which are without that now in other matters at Cologne, written to present such writing to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty such writing, and besides to request a gracious and dignified 1) answer.

(5) Thirdly, my most gracious and gracious lords, the electors and princes, also the two counts, and then our gracious lord Margrave George's councillors, also of the honourable cities, have promised each other embassies for themselves, and instead of their principals, on whose account they are here, and on whose account they have power, where the imperial treasurer, the Confederation of Swabia, or someone else, their electors and princes, or reported counts and cities, one or more, or someone of theirs, in matters of our holy faith, or what is attached to the same. or reported counts and cities, one or more, or one of their own, in matters of our holy faith, or what is attached to the same, would or would undertake on the outgoing parting, and in appearance of right or other ways complain, that all of their graces and favors shall be constant, reverent and helpful to each other in such, as for this reason also a special list has been drawn up, in which it is also provided in the end, if and when the said Protestant estates, or in particular, the aforementioned agreement or edict or mandate in matters of faith has been sent and inserted, how the aforementioned estates all, and each in particular, are to conduct themselves with the non-acceptance of such agreement, edict or mandate, so that it is unanimously held by their graces and in their favor, and nothing else is noted, except that all of their graces and in their favor want to stand and remain with each other in matters of faith.

6. Fourthly, because hitherto, from the fact that in almost every one of the Christian states of the principality, princely state, authorities, and territories, and indeed in almost every parish church, customs have been kept, as every pastor, regardless of whether he is learned or unlearned, has considered good, therefore causing such manifold annoyances not only among those who are contrary to the holy Gospel, but also among the good-hearted, and especially those who are still weak in the faith: It is considered Christian and good that all, and the greater part, of the above-mentioned Christian princes, rulers, and estates, their excellent learned theologians, legal scholars, and other persons of understanding, should be summoned to a named day, which our most gracious God has appointed.

1) Perhaps it is to be read: "gewierige", that is "granting" answer.

Lord, the Elector of Saxony, shall, within two months, send and appoint the next one to a place situated as against Nuremberg, not only to discuss whether a unanimous or uniform church order should be agreed upon and be good, but also to discuss how the public sin, disgrace and vice, by which not only the Gospel is blasphemed, but also God's wrath and punishment would be brought upon us, may be spiritually and temporally punished, stopped and occur. Which then would be pleasing to God Almighty, and would promote the holy Gospel in many ways; item, the same deputies are to compare immediately the counsels, which each estate is now to have made pending by its learned people, for the defense against the Fiscal, the League of Swabia, the Imperial Commission, or other authorities. The same applies to the appeal against the Augsburg Treaty, with a Christian and proper report on the articles written therein, and how our most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, has in the meantime, through his electoral grace, brought together excellent theologians and theologians of the Church. The other Christian states shall nevertheless have their theologians and other scholars draw up their consideration and opinion of such appeal in writing, and send it to our gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, as soon as possible, to be sent to his electoral scholars. The same is to be sent to the scholars of his electorate, if they find anything good in it, and if they would like to make use of it, so that the appeal can be made first of all according to all necessity.

(7) The estates, if they have not been authorized to appeal here, shall send their ratification of such appeal to the Elector of Saxony in the best form as soon as possible, so that there will be no lack of it.

(8) Fifthly, since the Anabaptist sect will not cease, and much evil and trouble is to be expected from the same rotteries, conventicles, and doctrines, as is also found in daily experience, the councils (as stated above), being appointed together, shall confer with one another and compare how the same Anabaptists, since their transgression is not the same, should and may be punished with God and a good conscience.

009 Sixthly, because the Christian estates, by public proclamation, and in other ways, have accused the whole of Christendom and are called out, as if they had neither reason nor justification for their actions, nor had they been consistent in their confession and actions at Augsburg, but had wavered from time to time, and had acted one against the other, which not only caused apostasy and harm to the Christian estates, but also to the holy Gospel, which, for the salvation of God's word, honor, and truth, and also for the salvation of the Christian estates, is a Christian letter and notice of all actions, in Latin and German, and also, where it could justly be done, in French, and be put into print, so that now each of the above-mentioned estates may soon have its good consideration and opinion of it put forward, and give notice to its learned councilors, who (as stated above) are to meet for other matters, to also compare it with one another, so that it may be put into print and go out in the future.

(10) It is also to be considered that, after the Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, Maj, and the kings of France and England, together with other potentates, are to meet shortly at Camereck 1) that the Christian estates may, without any doubt, be most highly reviled in the place, and practiced to move them against the Christian estates, that it shall be necessary and good to prepare the notice, or otherwise a short report of the action, in Latin, and where it may be, also in French, as soon as possible, that it may be sent to the Christian kings and other potentates, and, if need be, also in French, so soon that it may be sent to the Christian kings and other potentates, for the excuse of many Christian estates, and a true report of the transaction, which will then hopefully do much good, and prevent all kinds of harm.

(11) And because the appeal of the Christian estates is to be made not only in respect of nullity, but also in respect of justice, according to all necessity, and with the introduction of all action, it is deemed good to send to the kings of France, England and Poland, Navarre, Denmark, Sweden, and other potentates, credible copies of such appeal, at the first, and, if possible, before some of them meet with the imperial majesty, at their own embassy or otherwise by letter, or to demand that such appeal of the Christian estates be dismissed or promoted. Majesty, at their own embassy, or otherwise by letter, or if they should be required to desister or promote such an appeal of the Christian estates pro aeslutionis, and (not) to object to the Christian estates being admitted and allowed to execute their appeal.

(12) The same shall also be presented to the Imperial Majesty and to the Imperial Council. Majesty and the Imperial Chamber Court the appeal with humble and gracious request to establish and promote a Christian concilium in Germany as soon as possible, as the writings are therefore to be placed in the most gracious and necessary manner.

(13) Let every one of the Christian estates also consult with his scholars, and let them do so, seeing that there are some indications and suspicions that a council will shortly be instituted, that they may diligently seek to know the ancient constitutions of the churches, as well as the ancient decrees, and how the fathers taught and held the articles which are now ambiguous, and which are for and against us. Item, how the old Christian churches are held, and should be held in a Christian way. And if the opposition, as is to be presumed, wants to have a papal council, in which the pope is to be the head, and only the papal bishops are to vote, how this is to be countered and averted. That the same scholars of all estates may otherwise, in holy divine Scripture, make themselves skilful and ready to defend and preserve our holy faith and all that depends on it, with God's grace and help.

(14) For all these things may our Lord God give His Holy Spirit, wisdom, grace, power, strength, and eternal constancy, and in addition give peace to the Christian estates and to all Christendom, and everything that is conducive to His praise and glory; wherefore also the common estates should and will obtain God the Almighty in their churches of all their principality, principality, and territory, with earnest diligence and heartfelt petition, for the most beneficial.

(15) Finally, it is considered necessary and good that this parting, especially whether and how one has acted with the other for the sake of Christian understanding, be kept secret in the highest secrecy, and that no state should remember otherwise than as if one had indeed finally been compared with the other.

Actum on the last day of Decembris Anno Domini 1530.

Nota: After the other estates and cities have asked our most gracious lord, the Elector, after the decision of this farewell, if his electors have let the appeal of the Augsburg farewell be made to Nothurft. have had the appeal of the Augsburg parting made according to necessity, that his Electoral Grace grant the other estates and cities the right to appeal. Graces to send a copy of it to the other estates and cities before it is published.

1) "off" put by us instead of: "off".

so that they may also see themselves therein, it is granted by all such estates and cities that such shall be done, and the reported appeal, without their knowledge and will, shall not be published. Actum Schmalkalden, Saturday after Jnnocentium [Dec. 31] Anno Domini 1530.

1188 Letter of the Elector John to von der Planitz, after he had learned that they wanted to exclude him from the upcoming election of the Roman king out of hatred, because of religion. Nov. 15, 1530.

From Müller's Hist., lib. III, eup. 47, S. 994.

By the Grace of God John, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c.

Noble, dear faithful and councilor! Although you and others of our council have now written and reported to us what Imperial Majesty, together with Princes and Estates, has furthermore indicated to you and our kinsmen in messages of peace. Majesty, together with the Princes, Princes and Estates, has sent you and our fellow Councillors for the sake of peace, and you have acted diligently on this: You know, however, that in our departure from Augsburg we ordered you and the others to write from Torgau that you, for the sake of the four articles, namely our fief in the Church of Saxony, the confirmation of our son's marriage, and the others, where Count Palatine Frederick might be pardoned, should apply to the Emperor himself. Maj. himself. Now we have heard from your next writing that you have spoken to Count Palatine Frederick of this matter once more, and that his dear one has offered to ask Imperial Majesty again about it. Majesty; however, we have not heard from the letter that has now reached us what the matters of the four articles mentioned stand for, and whether you have received further notification from Palgrave Frederick on this matter from Imperial Majesty. Majesty or not. However, since we have a great deal of interest in this, especially for our fiefs, we write to you and the other councillors to encourage them once again, in accordance with our previous order, and in particular that we do not want to leave your confidential opinion undisclosed, since it is clear to us in many ways and in a credible manner that Imperial Majesty is completely determined to have this matter decided. Majesty shall be fully resolved and willing to support Her Majesty's brother, King Ferdinand. King Ferdinand to be Roman King, so the King shall also make some

We have described that the Bohemian lords are to travel with their royal dignities to Frankfurt on election day, and then to Aachen for the coronation, in such a way that they are to arrive at Nuremberg in the near future on Catharine [Nov. 25], and that we are to be excluded from the election and are not to be required to do so. Now we would like to know as much as possible whether this is to be the case or not, so that we can make our need known to the other Electors, as well as to others; For although we do not want to presume that their loved ones will subject themselves to such an unheard-of innovation and action, contrary to the Golden Bull and all the customs of the realm, in consideration of how they may well regard what incorrectness may result from this in the realm, moreover that we know from the graces of God that we do not give cause to separate ourselves, nor do we overcome any things to such an extent that we might be deprived of our office as churgeon by proper recognition: so it gives rise to no small suspicion among us that the Imperial Majesty Majesty is to break out of Augsburg recently and travel to Frankfurt together with the King and the Electors, and that the King has ordered his people out of the Crown of Bohemia, as has been stated, since we have not yet received any notification of this. And we consider it to be the case that the aforementioned four articles, and especially our fiefs, have now been observed by Imperial Majesty. Majesty, the trans 1) will finally find out whether we are to be lent or not, and thus whether we are to be considered a Elector or not. We have also been willing to send the letters of credence, together with instructions as to what you should have sent to our friends, the Electors and the absent embassies, on account of which we should have advertised; but we have also considered again that if we should send something special to their loved ones and to them, before we actually or safely know what our opinion should be, we would all the more like to give cause for reflection in acting against us. So that we may nevertheless more easily understand what our opinion should be, we graciously request that you, along with the others of our council, promote the answer to the four articles, and especially for the sake of the fiefs, because [we] fear that it is a vain delay on the part of Count Palatine Frederick, with Imperial Majesty, and therefore, with the help of the Emperor, we request that you send us the answer to the four articles, and especially for the sake of the fiefs, because we fear that it is a vain delay on the part of Count Palatine Frederick. Majesty, and therefore diligently persist, and what thereupon has fallen to answer, and you have heard of the indicated election and our separation, or possibly, ours therein.

1) Thran (?).

You will write and make known to us for our own hands in the most conducive and straightforward manner; you will show us special favor in this. Date Torgau, on the 15th day of November, the Tuesday after Martini, Anno Domini 1530.

1189. Excerpt from a letter of the Protestant Estates to Emperor Charles V, dated 24 December 1530, in which they object to the election of Ferdinand as Roman King.

This and the following document are found in Sleidanus, lib. VII, x>. 204.

Translated from the Latin.

You would hear, Your Imperial Maj. would have chosen their brother, Ferdinand, as Roman King at his request; but now it would be known to the men that the choice was with the Electors, and that they had the right, according to the Carolinian Law, to choose another after the death of the Emperor, in the name of the whole Roman Empire; and nevertheless the Elector of Mainz, during his Majesty's lifetime, and since the case in question had not yet occurred, had summoned them, the Electors, to Cologne at the end of this month, contrary to the above imperial law and custom; they also heard that the other Electors would assemble there at his request and, because of Ferdinand's advertisement, would actually carry out the election as if it had been agreed. For this rumor would already have spread far and wide; and since this was the case, they would have reminded His Majesty of one and the other. For although they would much rather refrain from such writing, they could not do so out of love for him and for the freedom of the fatherland gained from their ancestors, and in remembrance that in these last times deceit and trickery are very prevalent. For this reason, he would be well advised to remember above all how highly he has pledged himself to the empire, with what a noble oath he assures to uphold the Carolinian law, on which the freedom of the Roman empire primarily depends; how faithfully he vows not to do anything against it, nor to allow anyone to act contrary to it, as which treaties could not be broken, annulled, or changed, except with the consent of all the estates of the empire; but if now, during his lifetime, a Roman king were elected, and that a brother in the flesh, who would and would apply for it, he himself sees that this would not be possible with the consent of all the estates of the empire.

Because they, too, would not like to hear that either he was accused of not being faithful to the law, to the freedom of the empire, to the assurance given, to the treaty, and to the loyalty given; how it would weigh on him and on the whole empire to have at the same time two chiefs to whom one would have to be submissive on both sides. And because they would not like to hear that either he was accused of not being faithful, or that they were accused of being too sleepy and not seriously concerned about the welfare of the common people, they would rather ask him to believe that this letter of theirs would make them feel the love for the kingdom, ...that this letter of theirs would deprive them of their love to him and their country, and of their present course... ..and that they would take heed of their past histories, and set the election of a new king according to his reputation and power... ..considering what mischief would come of it in times to come, if it were not prevented. For this reason, they also sent letters to the other Electors, hoping that they would also do what would be beneficial to the common good, and that they would not give rise to any separation of the imperial estates. By the way, they would be ready to do everything for his sake that was within their powers and abilities. 2c.

1190: Excerpt from a letter of the Elector John of Saxony to the other Electors, in which he asks them with stated reasons to refrain from the election of a Roman king.

Because he had been summoned to Cologne by Churmainz, he had sent his son there together with some of his advisors, who were to present and act in his name; they would also have understood the most important things about them, according to his wishes, and would hear the rest on the 29th day of December. He exhorted them, however, to change their intention and to consider for themselves what harm and damage such an action would cause, both to themselves and to the descendants of the violated right and freedom of the empire; he also asked them to carry out what his son and his advisors had agreed with them in such a way that their love for the common good and for the fatherland could be clearly seen. 2c.

1191 D. Mart. Luther's letter to the Elector John of Saxony, concerning the election of a Roman king. December 12, 1530.

This letter is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 125; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 407; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 291; according to the original at the Basle University Library, VutoFrapü. Vol. XXV, toi. 31 in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 201; and in the Erlanger, vol. 54, p. 202.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord John, Duke of Saxony and Elector, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave in Meissen, my most gracious Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ. Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! My dear lord and friend, Doctor Brück, Chancellor, as E. C. F. G.'s command, has spoken to me secretly, and requests, as I see fit, to elect a Roman King in the matter now before us, after His Majesty has also requested E. C. F. G. to do so, as a Elector. However, as a lowly stature in the eyes of the world, I have neither much to advise nor much to know in such high matters concerning such great estates, for such matters, many circumstances and reputations are hidden from me; nor, as far as I can see from afar and from outside, do I wish to inform E. C. F. G. of my thoughts on the matter.

(2) First of all, I wish, if they want to elect a king, and do not want to resist such an undertaking, that E. C. F. G., in the name of God, always help to elect. And this is my motion. First of all, I am concerned that with this election cause will be sought for E. C. F. G., so that if E. C. F. G. refuses, they will have all the more reason to take the office from E. C. F. G. Otherwise, if E. C. F. G. were to choose to help, E. C. F. G. would in fact have both fiefdoms and chur, and their cunning plot to deprive E. C. F. G. of the chur would thus be prevented. Just as God prevented their wickedness in Augsburg, since they also thought that E. C. F. G. should not appear, and thus they would have a pretense of condemning E. C. F. G.; but this is wrong and they are sorry. So here in the election their wise senses would also be lacking, and E. C. F.G. would keep the fiefs and chur with great grudge. So E. C.

F. G. that it is no sin to choose an enemy of the gospel in a worldly way, because E. C. F. G. alone cannot prevent this, and yet it happens. For must E. C. F. G. must obey without the church, which condemns the gospel.

The other, where E. C. F. G. now refuses the election, it would perhaps be lent to Duke Georgen or others. Here it seems to me that there would be almost an annual event in the future where the title would once be given to another; for then everyone would want to inherit it for his descendants, and eternal envy, quarrels and discord would have to follow, if not much else. Should now E. C. F. G. be a cause for such a refusal of the election and be burdened with such evil in her conscience, then she could be free and rid of it with this election and without need delve into itZ) I would be sorry, and E. C. F. G. could be free and rid of it with this election, and without need delve into itZ) I would be sorry, and E. C. F. G. could be free and rid of it with this election, and without need delve into it. C. F. G. perhaps in the sight of God. It would be better to dare to choose God, who knows how to send things differently in the future, because we do not care or think that one would get stuck in such certain present journeys and causes of conscience without need; E. C. F. G. can well stay with the Gospel, if King Ferdinandus offers almost as much against it, as has happened so far under the Emperor. Also, God alone is a master and governor of future cases where he is believed. For I would not like that C.F.G.'s faith and trust in God, now so gloriously shown and proven at Augsburg, should now perish in this case, and give way to thoughts of future things, especially because here neither Scripture nor necessity compel such thoughts to be followed, and may well be circumvented.

(4) The third, where the C.F.G. refuses to vote, the empire is already torn apart and Germany separated, from which war and all misery must follow. For neither part will yield to the other, and yet without war neither can conquer the other. Since necessity does not demand this, it will be difficult for E. C. F. G. to burden his conscience with this without necessity, as an initial cause of such separation and all kinds of misery. These are difficult things, God knows that; but

1) In the original: "verteufele".

God help us that we do not make them much more difficult, precisely because we want to make them easier. After all, future things are not in man's knowledge or power, as the old histories teach us, and (where God or necessity does not demand it) things always turn out differently, because one thinks that one must say: I had not meant it. If it has not come to Augsburg now, Pope and Emperor, as they thought, it shall not come to them hereafter, because they want to grasp it with their thoughts. Only that we remain with God and do not, as they do, embark on uncertain future journeys without need.

(5) Thus E. C. F. G. know that the Landgrave wants to come forth without this, and has had himself enrolled as a citizen of Zurich, which I am truly not very pleased about, and where God does not help nor hinder, it must become a great war, and E. C. F. G. will not be able to help. C. F. G. know that in such a war the error of the sacrament must nevertheless be defended, even driven upon us; for this Christ, my Lord, protect E. C. F. G. For the Swiss have not yet recanted, nor do they fight out of necessity, but to preserve the error. O Lord God, I am too childish for such worldly matters. I will ask and entreat that God will grant E. C. F. G. be mercifully protected and guided, as has been the case up to now; or, if something should ever happen that I do not like to see, that he will not leave us with grace, and will give a merciful means and end, amen. E. C. F. G. Will graciously pardon my unintelligible ramblings. I speak as I understand it, but I know well that I would like to have E. C. F. G.'s conscience safe and free, and that it would be the greatest sorrow to me if I should see it driven or troubled. Herewith I command E. C. F. G. in God's grace, Amen. On Monday after Nicolai s12. ## 1192. Philip Melanchthon's misgivings about the election of a Roman king.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 126 b; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 408; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 408, and in the 60rr>. Net. , vol. II, 447.

001 From the time of Carolo Magno, when the Roman empire still had Asiam and Europam, it often happened that an emperor made another emperor to himself. For if the people of war lay in a country far from the emperor, and there was a turbulent captain among them, he would rise up for an emperor. To prevent such rebellion, the emperors would rather elect emperors of their own whom they would tolerate than hear that unfaithful tyrants rose up and sat down against them. Thus Marcus Antonius made his brother Verum emperor at the same time as himself, and Constantinus ruled at the same time as Diocletiano in the Orient, Constans in the Occident, and afterwards Arcadius in the Orient, Honorius in the Occident 2c.

002 After Carolo, however, when the old monarchy was broken up, and only Jtalia and Germany were called the Roman empire, before the order of the electors, some of them, while they lived, but in old age and shortly before their death, made their sons emperors; such was the necessity at that time; as, Oarolus NaMus OuäovieumOuäovi6U8 ?iu8 Ootliuritim, and OotliEiu8 Ouäovieum Kseunäum.

(3) These are not to be respected as co-ruling emperors, for their fathers died soon after their election. Otto the First alone had his son Otto the Other crowned as a co-ruling lord to rule in Jtalia.

004 Afterward, when the order of princes was made, many, more than before, chose their sons to be kings, and had them crowned.

5th First of all Conradus, in the second year of his reign, before he received the imperial crown, had his son Henricum Nigrum crowned king at Aachen.

6th This Henricus Niger, shortly before his death, had his son Henricum the Fourth, being not above five years old, crowned king.

7th Fridericus Barbarossa made his son Henricum Roman king during his life, and they reigned many years at the same time.

008 This Henricus afterward practiced with the German princes, that they undertook to make his son, Fredericum the Other, king of Rome, when he was yet a child of three years old; but this was kept.

9th Then Fridericus Secundus, while he was still alive, had his elder son Henricum crowned king of Rome, who died before his father; for which reason the father also had his other son Conradum crowned while he was still alive, who was crowned king of Rome at both imperial congresses, at Speier, and at the same time was crowned king of Rome. and Augsburg, was accepted as a Roman king, and later succeeded his father in the empire.

(10) Carolus IV, who has renovated the bull, has practiced that Wenceslaus is elected during his life. And a historian, Egnatius, says: Dxsxmlo maxims imxrodunão, that is, that an evil example was made; perhaps especially because he is said to have forgiven some of the kingdom's regalia and other things for that reason.

11 Fridericus III also had his son Maximilianum elected during his life.

1193 History of the Election of the Roman King at Cologne, Jan. 5, 1531.

This writing is found at the locations indicated in the previous number (but not in the Oorx. Lst. ) immediately after it.

(1) After the Diet of Augsburg was dissolved, and the princes and chieftains departed again, the Emperor Carol, together with the Imperial Majesty's brother King Ferdinand, then King of Hungary and Bohemia, also departed from Augsburg in the month of November, and many princes with them, and went to Cologne on the Rhine. Her Imperial Majesty Her Imperial Majesty has written to the Elector of Saxony that he should hurry to Cologne on the 21st day of December, since there were things to be done that would be of great concern to the Roman Empire. This letter was delivered to the Elector on the 28th day of November, in which his Electoral Grace was reminded of his highest duty to appear at Cologne. On the same day, a letter, citation, and request from the Archbishop of Mainz, as Archchancellor of the Empire, was sent to His Electoral Grace, informing him that the Emperor requested him to summon the Electors for the election of a Roman king; therefore, His Electoral Grace should arrive at Cologne on the 9th day of November.

(2) When now their Electoral Grace was required by two writs. They have given notice of this to the Landgrave of Hesse and to other relatives, princes and cities of their confession, and have asked them to meet in Schmalkalden on the second and twentieth day of December. In the meantime, the Elector's. Grace has appointed their son, Duke Johann Friederich of Saxony, with a constant and legitimate excuse of their staying out, delivered in their stead on a certain day with an instruction. As then her F. Grace arrived at Cologne on the evening of the 19th day of December, the end of which the Imperial Majesty had also arrived only two days before. Thereupon H. F. G. on the 20th day of December to announce himself to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty and ask for gracious interrogations, which were graciously granted to S. F. G. the same day. And after the advertisement, Her Imperial Majesty was graciously satisfied with the excuse of the Elector's absence, together with the due offer of inheritance, and was satisfied and pleased with the sending of S. C. F. G.'s son.

(3) And after the other Electors had not yet all arrived, the main remonstrance of the Imperial Majesty was raised until Christmas Eve, which at that time was the second and third day of December. Majesty, on which the causes of her letter were based, was delayed until Christmas Eve, which at that time was the fourth and twentieth day of December, since all the Electors were present in person, except Cologne and Saxony, whose authorized embassy appeared at that time; although Cologne still arrived in person that same evening. And after the revered Electors had required rooms in the Imperial Majesty's. Majesty, the Emperor also summoned the Cardinal and Bishop of Liège, Duke Frederick, Count Palatine, the Margrave of Ansbach, Margrave Henry of Nassau, the Lord of Grate, Camerarium, and Alexander Schweiß, Secretarium. Maj. first in person and orally, then in writing through Count Palatine Friederichen, the Summarial Articles reproached the Electors, concerning the election of a Roman King, that Her Majesty intended to tolerate her brother, King Ferdinandum, as Roman King next to her, whom the Electors also wanted to suffer next to them; and causes were brought forward for this intention:

(4) That Her Imperial Majesty has been endowed by God with many hereditary kingdoms, lands and people. Maj. has been endowed by God with many hereditary kingdoms, lands, and people, over which all may preside, Her Imperial Majesty would not have their essential abstention in the Empire of the German Nation. Maj. would not have their essential abstention in the Empire of the German Nation. Since now her Imperial Maj. Maj. is called to the dignity of the Roman Empire, so that so much faithful providence may be done to it, Her Majesty considers it necessary to have a head of a Roman king next to her, with indication and introduction of several moving causes, the careful and dwindling courses which have occurred and happened everywhere in Christendom, but especially in the German nation, of her absence, above all with the error and the corruption of the Roman Empire.

Conflict of Faith. Item: The Turk's arduous, swift, practiced action, as the enemy of Christianity, which took place last year. The previous general uprising in the empire was also caused by circumstances. It is said that in many other ways disobedience has grown up in the kingdom.

(5) And even though it is not without the order to maintain the regiment and the empire, with the advice and foreknowledge of the princes and the other imperial estates, the same would not be duly obeyed if the empire were not provided with a head that was essentially with it. Therefore Her Imperial Majesty graciously requests Maj. graciously requests that a Roman King be elected in addition to Her Majesty, one who is understanding, laborious, capable of handling, also of possible power in lands and people, who is inclined to handle peace and justice, and who is also knowledgeable and experienced in the affairs of the realm, and in whom Her Imperial Majesty will have confidence. Maj. have to trust.

(6) According to which Her Imperial Majesty Majesty knew of no one more suitable or useful than Her Imperial Majesty's brother Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia. Ferdinandum, King of Hungary and Bohemia, which kingdom and country, as a rampart, protection and shield of the German nation, would be situated at the stay of the Turk, whom also her Majesty would tolerate and suffer beside her.

(7) The princes and embassies took this into consideration, and asked for a copy of the provisions that had been made, which was granted to them. And on the following 26th day of December, on the day of St. Stephen, they met again in the Barfüßerkloster in Cologne, there they read over the articles anew, and in the Council they unanimously agreed that the Imperial Majesty should first of all be requested and asked, in response to such aforementioned remonstrance and request, that Her Majesty graciously wish to remain in the Empire of the German Nation, with the offering of all due obedience, as her Emperor and Lord. Where also her Elector. If their Electors or other estates give their Majesty cause for such a proceeding and departure from the German nation, they would be sorry to take it, and if it were indicated by their Majesty, they would put an end to it and change it.

This was done early that day before noon, and presented to the Imperial Majesty by the Elector of Brandenburg. Majesty by the Elector of Brandenburg.

(9) But the Imperial Majesty has insisted on her previous opinion and gracious request. Majesty insisted on her previous opinion and gracious request and rested, with the appendix that her Imperial Majesty would not know how to attract the Electors nor the Estates with some accusation.

(10) For this reason the Electors have again asked for their consideration, which has been granted to them. So their Electors are all together with King Ferdinand. All of them, together with King Ferdinand, met again the next day, December 27, in person at the aforementioned Barfüßerkloster, and discussed the matter further. In such a council, without any special moving causes, unanimous votes were immediately cast for the election, and were unanimously agreed upon: because the Imperial Majesty was not satisfied with the election. Majesty has persisted in her request and intention that Her Imperial Majesty be further requested and granted. Majesty should be further requested and petitioned that they, the Electors, be allowed a free election.

11 Although the articles, as reported before, were handed over to the Archbishop of Mainz, as Archchancellor, and read out in the Council, the Saxons also requested a copy of the necessity, but they were refused. Then the son of the Elector of Saxony, and also the next in power, Mr. Hans von Mingwitz, knight and skilful, did not want to consent that the Imperial Majesty should ask for the election. Majesty for the election should be requested or asked, according to the recorded concerns.

(12) First, because the Imperial Majesty has finally decided, among other things, that no other than her Majesty's brother is to be tolerated. Firstly, because the Imperial Majesty has finally decided, among other things, that no other than her Majesty's brother is to be tolerated and tolerable.

(13) Secondly, that it may be noted immediately, as if one wished to take part in the election, and to surrender to the Imperial Majesty's will. Majesty's will.

(14) Thirdly, that the articles and causes submitted to Imperial Maj. Maj. and causes among them, the Electors, have not yet been considered in public council.

(15) Fourthly, that it should be much less considered whether the Imperial Majesty, by virtue of the Bull of Gold, should be entitled or entitled to such. The fourth is that much less consideration should be given to whether the imperial majesty, by virtue of the golden bull, should be entitled or entitled to such a thing; for the freedom and justice of the Roman Empire, and of the princes, are based on this, and not the least dedicated to it. For the golden bulla gives them the choice only in the case of necessity, and no further; namely, if the empire is without a head, if it is vacated or transferred, if a Roman emperor or king dies, in clear words, only in the case of death. It would also be in public usage that, in the event of the death of a Roman Emperor or King, both Electors, Palatinate and Saxony, would be vicars, and would have the administration of the Empire, each in his own district.

016 Fifthly, that besides the high obligation and allowance, so by pledged

Oath-true to Her Imperial Majesty. This is to be handed over to each Elector in particular upon the arrival of Her Majesty's election, nor is it yet known, seen, or taken in hand what would be due to Her Majesty in this matter. For such a liberation of the Roman Empire would affect all the common estates of the Empire, and not only the Electors.

(17) From all this, the princes would then have to remember what they all wanted to do with God and God's will. Also, whether such would be considered beneficial to the Roman Empire's honor and welfare, sovereignty and dignity, freedom and justice 1). Then also to consider further that because the Imperial Majesty is the only one who has the right to do so. Majesty. (God grant a long life!) is still alive and in good health and mind, in addition in the choice of her imperial profession with the kingdoms and lands. (God grant long) still alive and in good health and good sense, and in the choice of her imperial profession with the kingdoms and lands, as now, gifted, on which her Majesty's Causes are partly to be found in the desired election, that her Imperial Majesty has also chosen among others. Majesty had also, among others, committed and agreed to remain the greater part in the Empire of the German Nation. In addition, not to act or do anything contrary to the golden bulla, the liberties and rights of the Empire, nor to strive for the succession of the inheritance of the Empire; which would have the Imperial Confirmation Charter and obligation in itself.

(18) Therefore, if the liberty and justice of the kingdom are not primarily based on and dedicated to the bull of gold, let all be careful not to live contrary to it, but to follow the measured and expressed command of the bull of gold in an orderly manner. After obvious causes, from which it happened in former times, that the election of a Roman king could only be decided by the six chapters of the Roman Catholic Church, the Roman Catholic Church was the first to decide. The common estates of the empire had practiced this practice for five hundred years before, but now it has been ordered and directed that these same electors should act according to the contents of the golden bull, as a measured command; However, the King of Bohemia, as the seventh person, was subsequently appointed over a long period of time, and thus placed on the seventh person, out of the coincidence that if in the aforementioned election there were comparable votes, that each part would have three, so that in such a case future errors would be cut off and dealt with. 2c., and the ordinary election, in the case of the dissolution of the realm, is permitted to the same Electors 2c.

1) So put by us instead of: "Also whether in such. ... would be deemed fit."

(19) And if anything should ever be done and acted outside of the order and permission of the Golden Bull, it must be done at their discretion, with the prior knowledge of the Imperial Estates; then that should be considered and taken into account which may be necessary, honest, and beneficial to the Roman Empire, and which may also be conducive to the welfare and service of the Empire.

(20) The bull of gold, which has been mentioned several times, as the principal article of one on which the Roman Empire's freedoms and rights are based, has been confirmed and providentially confirmed by the present Roman Imperial Majesty, Carolo, our most gracious Lord, in the most necessary and honest manner, that the same shall be kept and remain in all respects strong, dignified, and inviolate. In addition, Her Majesty does not wish to act, seek, desire or strive for succession and inheritance by herself in any way other than in accordance with the content of the Imperial Decree. Her Majesty's granting and prescribing, according to the contents of the articles, against all princes and the realm in general, to the highest extent prescribed and obligated, not to be too fine nor to do anything against it.

21 For this reason, it cannot be argued, nor can it be justified, that Emperor Wenceslas blessed was also a Roman king, and that Emperor Frederick, of laudable memory, elected Maximilian king in the same way, so that the presumed intention should also be justified.

22. But against this it is to be considered that by one or two instances of imprudence, in the case of which the liberty and justice of the golden bull, as a measured, orderly command, would have been acted, which is to be indicated by another report, such imprudence or imprudence cannot have so much effect, that with it or by it such liberty and justice of the whole realm, the golden bull, is violated, abrogated, much less applied, and that the electors by it of their own will or interpretation, in such important matters, have to act outside and against the golden bull, for these reasons:

(23) That the succeeding Roman Kings and Emperors, especially the present reigning Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, confirm the oft-mentioned golden bulla, and all the liberty and justice of the Empire, in the most constant and dignified manner. Maj. our most gracious Lord, have confirmed and reaffirmed the oft-mentioned golden bulla, and all the liberty and justice of the Empire, in the most constant, dignified and powerful manner. In addition to all this, the succession to the inheritance of the tribe is not to be sought or claimed.

24th As all these things aforesaid, and the articles of prescription, which pass one to each elector, entail.

(25) For this reason, it is to be considered and heard what the Electors, according to their presumed authority, are to do about the measured and orderly command of the Golden Bull, without the knowledge and consent of the other Imperial Estates.

(26) And what therefore might happen to the division, discord, and disquietude, to the mischief and diligence, among the estates of the Roman empire, from such an act, that they should be related to two lords with oaths. The oath that the princes of the empire take also reminds us of the special assurance that they have made, namely, that they have been duly and properly mentioned, from which they, the princes, may be charged with cause and agitation.

27 Which all in friendly opinion, on the duty, so that the Elector of Saxony Roman Imperial Maj. Maj. and to the realm, thus want to have reminded and advanced.

28 And because of this, the other six Electors, who on the day named hereafter, all wished to proceed personally with the election of a Roman king, have, in spite of all the exhortations, indicated as much as they can in order. The Elector of Saxony, through his son, Duke John Frederick, in addition to the attorney in this most important matter, as Mr. Hans von Mingwitz, Knight, on their written mandate, in the beginning of the ninth and twentieth day of December, has determined to proceed with the election, which was determined and announced for the election (when they, the six Electors, were together with some and many of their excellent counsellors, and assembled and arrived for the office of the mass in the chapter house of the high monastery at Cologne to talk personally in the vault, where the Saxons had also been appointed), against the same their elector. G. and publicly, by well-founded, honorable and lawful causes, against the nullity of the Archbishop of Mainz, Elector and Archchancellor of the Roman Empire in Germania, out of unavoidable necessity, according to their submitted mandate, as a necessary, unavoidable beginning, this time excited and protested, in the presence and appointment of two notaries, also the same article of exception immediately handed over in writing, and requested to be read.

29. the same conducive also together with the er-

(30) But to have the articles of exception and the petition made public at that time was refused by the Electors; therefore the Saxons had cause to be heard: one would not know how to avoid, because it had been refused to be read publicly, to have it passed on, as was due.

(31) Although first of all, before the protestation and exception, the Elector of Brandenburg, on the mandate submitted, indicated on behalf of all the Electors that it would not be sufficient for the election.

32 Answered again briefly: it would be sufficiently provided that H. F. G.'s son, Duke Johann Friedrich, and his deputy would be authorized to do so; for their minds would not be at the election for the aforementioned reasons.

33) On this the articles of exception were handed over as reported before, and the protest was made, but not read out publicly.

34 And so the young prince and the skilful counsellors of the Elector of Saxony, after the public and taken farewell, immediately on the protestation made, after an early meal, rode off from Cologne at 12 o'clock without danger to the Duke of Jülich, Eleve and Berg, the young duke, Johann Friedrich of Saxony's smith.

The Archbishop of Cologne and Elector was initially not present in person at the holding of the election by His Majesty the Emperor. Majesty, also not in the council discussions, but only appeared present on the certain election day begun, the 29th of December, but his councilors were present.

Subsequently the election took place in Cologne over several days, and furthermore the coronation in Aach on January 11, 1531 with all ceremonies in the presence of the Emperor. Maj. attendance happened.

1194 The Schmalkaldic League for the protection of true Christian religion and what is pending to it, made February 7, 1531, six years ago.

By the Grace of God, we John, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, and John Frederick, father and son, Dukes of Saxony, Landgraves of Thuringia and Margraves of Meissen, Philip, Ernst and Francis, brothers and cousins, all Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen, of Diez, Ziegenhain and Nidda, Wolfgang, Prince of Anhalt, Count of Ascania, Lord of Berneburg, Gebhardt and Albrecht, brothers, counts and lords of Mansfeld, and mayor, councilman, Jnnungsmeister, council and commonalty of the following named cities of the upper Netherlands, Saxony and the sea, as Strasbourg, Ulm, Constance, Reutlingen, Memmingen, Lindau, Biberach, Jsni, Lübeck, Magdeburg and Bremen, hereby confess, and make known to all men:

1. After the rulers of this time now and then show themselves in such a way carefully, swiftly and in advance, as if they desired to have those preach and proclaim the bright, clear, pure and unmistakable word of God in their principalities and cities, countries and territories by grace and bestowal of the Almighty, and thereby to put a stop to all kinds of abuses and to change them, and to urge them on with the deed and the painting of their Christian intention, and it is the duty of every Christian authority not only to have the holy Word of God proclaimed to their subjects, but also to see to it with all diligence, earnestness, and ability that they are not compelled by the Word of God or made derogatory to it: Our supreme need and the duty of the authorities require us to determine whether it should happen now or in the future that someone should force us or our subjects by painting or deed from the Word of God and the known truth (which the gracious and merciful God graciously prevents, and we do not wish to provide for anyone else), and thus again to urge them to prevent the abuses that have been committed and changed with all possible diligence.

2. So that such violence may be averted, and the destruction of both body and soul, ours and our subjects, may be prevented: We have therefore declared to God Almighty, for the praise and greater prosperity and growth of divine free doctrine, for the awakening and promotion of a Christian, unanimous being and peace, the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, and all respectability, in addition to common our principalities, cities and regions for good welfare, honor, benefit and piety, solely for the defense and method of salvation, which is not only of natural origin to each of us.

The same are not only permitted and granted by human, but also by divine written laws, united with and against each other of a Christian and friendly mind, determined to receive and accept the same, and do so at present in and by virtue of this letter, in measure, form, and shape, as follows:

(3) Namely, that we should and will, in all things, each faithfully and heartily mean, hold, and warn the other from harm; and that we should and will not, publicly or secretly, with knowledge, bring forward, advance, or refrain from the other's enemies and repugnants.

4. And therefore this understanding alone is a defense and a salvation, and is not considered at all that any one of us should begin a war; if it should happen that some part of us, whoever it might be, should be brought forward for the word of God, evangelical doctrine, and our holy faith, or for things which follow from the word of God, evangelical doctrine, and the holy faith, and depend upon the same; or if another matter is brought against one of us for a pretence, but we, the others, who have not been attacked at such a time, may judge that it is primarily for the sake of this word of God that it should be attacked or violated and overdrawn, or that it should be attacked and overdrawn, and that the same should suffer the others to be justified in the end, that then all of us, the others, in this Christian understanding, and each for himself, as soon as we are informed and understand this by the one who has been raped, or otherwise by credible experience, should not let the matter concern us in any other way, than as if each of us were himself attacked, attacked, attacked, and thus were his own cause; Thereupon also, without any delay, each, according to his highest ability, shall unexpectedly help, save, and rescue the other, the attacked and violated, and have and make room for it; How then at any time, according to the occasion of the trade, by us, the rest, most easily and fruitfully considered good and serviceable, and our each Christian love and faithfulness, also his own conscience and even welfare will point to it, and thus faithfully help each other lead the trade, also no part without the other's knowledge let itself or go into some direction, contract or decency.

(5) This Christian mind of ours shall not be subject to the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, or to any state of the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, or to any state of the Holy Roman Empire, or anyone else, but solely for the preservation of Christian truth and peace in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, and for the removal of unjust violence, for us and our subjects and relatives, undertaken solely in defence and by way of salvation, since each of us, as touched upon above, may give and take right, and nothing else may be meant.

1) In the old edition: "believers".

006 If any man also desire to enter further into this Christian understanding of ours, and were not formerly apprehended therein, who have received the holy gospel, let him be received and accepted therein with the knowledge and will of us all.

007 And this Christian understanding shall begin at this time, and continue six years next succeeding each other, and shall be performed and kept by us all, and by every one in particular, faithfully, sincerely, honestly, and without all danger.

8. And even if it were a fact that one should come to war with someone because of the divine word and the cause flowing from it, and that before the end of the six years mentioned, it should not be brought to an end, nevertheless, that of all parts, regardless of the fact that the Christian understanding has come to an end, no part should withdraw or separate from it, notwithstanding that the appointed years have fully expired, and that the Christian understanding has come to an end, it shall be faithfully maintained and carried out to the end, and no part shall withdraw or separate itself therefrom, and this Christian understanding may then, if it please the parties, be prolonged.

(9) We the aforesaid Electors, Princes, Counts and Councillors of the Cities, by our honours, dignities, true words and good faith, do promise and swear, in lieu of an oath, for ourselves and our heirs or descendants 2c., in and by virtue of this present letter, to hold true, steadfast, firm and unbreakable, to comply therewith wholly and to live, not to do nor create to be done contrary thereto, in any way or manner, all honestly, faithfully and safely.

(10) And therefore, for more evidence, security, and confirmation, we the above-mentioned Electors, Princes, Counts, and Cities have affixed our seals, as we Duke John, Elector, for us, and our son, Duke Frederick of Saxony 2c., and Duke Ernst, for us, and our two brothers, Duke Otten, and Franzen of Lüneburg, do knowingly affix to this letter, and give it on Monday after the Sunday of Invocavit [7 Feb.], after the birth of Christ our dear Lord, one thousand five hundred and one and thirty years.

Luther's, Melanchthon's, and Bugenhagen's Rathschlag on the action at Schmalkalden. August 1531.

This objection is found in the Altenburg edition, vol. VIII, p. 974; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 346; in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 281 and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 54, p. 244. The original is found in the Weimar archive, Lk2. 8, p. 42. From it, Burkhardt, p. 197, lists a large number of important variants that have not yet been used in any edition and are now used here for the first time. In the editions mentioned above, Jonas is erroneously named as the third contributor to this concern. It was not Jonas, but Bugenhagen who participated in the deliberation of this consideration, in that he only reviewed the consideration written by Luther and Melanchthon and added marginal glosses. But neither De Wette nor Burkhardt has reproduced these. The first two paragraphs are by Melanchthon, the rest is in Luther's handwriting. - We have set the time according to De Wette, who states that this concern is 'about the peace negotiations to be held between the Protestant princes and the Electors of Mainz and of the Palatinate in Schmalkalden'.

001 In doctrine, according to the confession, one cannot and ought not to depart. For Christ thus saith, "He that confesseth me before men" 2c. For the parts which we dispute concern the main part of Christian doctrine; if the same is obscured or denied, no one can know what Christ is, and so Christ is blasphemed, and consciences can have no right consolation at all.

(2) Whether, in ceremonies and customs, liberty is to yield and yield somewhat for the sake of peace and love? Whether the bishops are to be allowed their jurisdiction and authority over ours? Some think that nothing should be yielded, even in outward liberty. For if one wants to yield something, one should do so for the sake of the brethren. Now the bishops and the opposing party are not brothers, but enemies and wolves, against whom one is obliged to show oneself as enemies again. And especially of the jurisdiction and power of the bishops it is considered, that though the bishops would accept us, and leave us the doctrine, yet if they persecute the doctrine in their countries, and kill our brethren, we should not hold them for bishops and brethren.

is unpleasant. We cannot restore the private masses, because it is public that they hold and teach them as before, that such masses are all applied, as their foundation, seals, and letters, as well as their books and customs, convince us mightily, and they work to ensure that such masses remain, to prevent and confirm said abuses. But whether they want to pretend that they want to keep the private mass only out of devotion and to report to themselves, 1) one cannot believe that it is serious, unless they condemn and reject their letters, seals, both canons and books, which are written about it. And though they be in earnest, yet it is not lawful for any man to report himself, because it is a sacrament, and hath a ministerium, as little as any man can baptize himself, or call himself to the preaching office. Nor can they otherwise use and enjoy the sacrament, and there is no need, nor any need, to set up such a dangerous and annoying secondary service, and to create a superstition.

(4) Whether they would have us teach that it is right to take and administer one form of the sacrament, as well as to give and take both forms, lest we condemn all Christendom. Here we cannot consent or approve in any way that the bishops may have the right and power to command or forbid one form, nor can such an outrage ever be excused before God, because Christ's and Paul's word stands clear, and establishes both forms. Now no man, says St. Paul, should change God's will or do so. But with this we do not condemn those who have been forced to take one form and have done so unwillingly, even though they have done wrong; but we commend them to the mercy of God, who forgives even more and greater sins daily to his afflicted and poor sinners, who can also forgive the sins of his saints. But the bishops are not such poor sinners, because they do not recognize such iniquity and violence as sin, but defend it as the right and article of faith. Therefore they have no hope of forgiveness of sin in this, but must be badly damned.

005 Neither do we like that absolution should come out of the church, and that men should run so roughly to the sacrament. And although we do not want to force or compel anyone to confess a mortal sin, nor do we want to oblige them to tell all their sins and torture their consciences, as under the pope, yet this is just as unacceptable as prohibiting confession and removing absolution from the church for this reason. For there must remain a form and discipline in the church, which cannot be maintained without confession. And if people were not accustomed to respect sin in confession and to wait for absolution or forgiveness, in time absolution and forgiveness of sin would be completely extinguished and become an unknown thing, and people would again run to the sacrament out of their own devotion, as before. So, too, we must leave room for the consoling free Gospel, that it may be said to one man as well as to many. But what is absolution but the gospel told to a single man, who thereby receives consolation for his confessed sin? Thus Christ's example is found in Matt. 9, where he absolved the gout-ridden one by one, and in Luc. 7, where he absolved Mariam Magdalenam also one by one.

6th On the other hand, to restore the jurisdiction of the bishops, because in this also nothing else is sought for peace, methinks that not enough causes are shown to deny the jurisdiction altogether, that they are wolves and our enemies. In this case we must take comfort in the fact that in former times the Jews also had to receive the priesthood from Herod and the Romans, as Josephus writes, even though Herod also tormented and strangled them. And how have the Bohemians done hitherto, whom the pope condemned and persecuted, and yet they had him ordain them priests and took them; and what have the dear prophets had to do and suffer in the time of the kings in Israel, by whom they were also strangled and persecuted, and yet they were obedient and subject to them, so far as it was not against God.

Thus Zacharias, John's father, had to suffer from Annas and Caiphas received his office. How much more may I accept the jurisdiction of the bishops, because they sit in the office and in the place of the apostles, even though they are wolves and rabid, if they do not force us to do this against God, but let our doctrine remain. Now if the bishops would consent to leave us the pure doctrine of the gospel, and our priests, our priests shall be subject to them as bishops, and not as wolves. Although we cannot think how the bishops may or can do this, that they should leave us the pure gospel. For in so doing they would have to grant that we should publicly condemn their doings in the pulpit and in the writings, and that we should oppose and discourage everything that is contrary to the gospel; which is impossible for them to suffer, for they themselves would gladly perish, and call us to cry out and write against them. Since this is the case, it seems to us to be of great use not to complain about granting jurisdiction to such measures. For in this way we would have the blessing, and they the displeasure, if they would not accept the offered jurisdiction, unless the gospel had first been denied and condemned by us. This would also excuse our conscience before God and the world, so that we could not be called schismatics, and all their arguments would be dispelled, since they claim that they have the possessorium and the tradition, and sit in the place of the apostles. But if we are totally opposed to the jurisdiction, they are in disfavor, and we are in disfavor, since they do not want to give way in any small way. So there's no way here. For if they grant us the free gospel, as it is not possible, they have received evil things in the ceremonies and jurisdiction which we grant against the gospel which they grant us. How would I have to act if I were among the murderers? I would have to be a prisoner and a servant, and yet not do anything against God, as St. Paul was a gardener under King Attila, and yet had not lost his bishopric, nor had he left it. So here also is no more than an outward prison, if we would so accept and suffer the jurisdiction, and yet keep the gospel.

The gospel was freely kept against them. Truly I fear that with such a refusal of jurisdiction we stand in our own light, and take and secure things too surely beforehand with reason; just as if God should not also be able to do something in this, more and differently than we believe or think, since the things are his own, and he will also do better for it, as has been done up to now, than we, if we can only trust him.

007 If the bishops would henceforth take the matrimonial cases to themselves to judge, we would not only not complain, but also consider it cheerfully and willingly, because it is a laborious and perilous work, and perhaps in the future we might pronounce as unjust a judgment as they do, because the time is almost swift, and may become still swifter, with the spirits of the wicked, and many other grievous affairs; wherefore we would well lay aside what we could. For we have enough to do without that. For what we have taught and said about the degrees, we have not done to establish laws or new rights, but to comfort and secure the consciences of those who are not sufficiently assured by the dispensation of the pope, or who are otherwise burdened by such rights, so that they do not think that they must break such marriages before God, and listen to one another for the sake of man's command. For our teaching is always directed to the captive, confused, afflicted consciences, so that they may be granted such Christian teaching and freedom. Hereby we give nothing to the raw rabble, but throw them fresh under the most strict laws, and let them remain under them, and do not call them to make a right out of our comfort and freedom, no lidortus [in 1] oooasion6IN oorurn äotur.

8 Although we do not want to complain to our Gn. H. conscience that his Electoral Grace has taken some goods from monastery estates. Gn. took some goods from monastery estates. Because this is publicly known, that at this time all church matters and affairs were on his electoral grace's neck, and that it was a matter of great concern to us. and great cost and effort have been expended on them, and yet he has not been guilty of taking any of his own goods from the monastery.

1) We have added this "in" after Gal. 5,13. There it says: in ooeasionkm earns.

To bear such cost and trouble for the goods. For this reason, according to the Gospel, it is due to His Holy Grace to receive reimbursement. Paul says in 1 Corinthians 9: "Who ever travels on his own fare?" and Christ in Matthew 10: "A laborer is worth his wages. Moreover, many pastors and preachers have to be appointed from common castles. As many parish priests are endowed with such estates. However, it seems good to us that we should be careful about such corrupt estates and

For the sake of our being, we are not very much deterred. And if the clergy were so hard to be appointed, that they might be made to eat and drink in their God's name, yet except the first part, that they should not teach nor live contrary to the gospel, nor set up again their blasphemous services. For if they would reprove and perform these things, they are not to be tolerated, neither are they to be suffered; and though they were to be set up, yet we cannot consent thereto.

D. Martin Luther's answer to the Elector of Saxony's admonition to him to refrain from harsh writing, especially against Duke George, so that peace would not be prevented. July 29, 1531.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 470; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 332; in the Altenburg, vol. v, p. 591; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 345; in the Erlangen, vol. 54, p. 240; and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 276.

Grace and peace. Most noble Prince, most gracious Lord! My dear lord and friend D. Brück, Chancellor, in E. C. F. G.'s name, that I would henceforth refrain from harsh writing, especially concerning Duke Georgen, as far as it would ever be possible for the sake of my conscience and doctrine, so that the peace and treaty, recently granted by God's grace at Grimme, would not be shattered or prevented.

Now it is true that Duke George has noticeable knots and lumps in my skirt. But that they may see that I also have a desire for peace, and that I do not write my evil books out of spite, I will let all this go and be given away, so long as Duke George leaves me satisfied and does not cause any new unpleasantness; also with the reservation, where other papists did not want to keep peace with me, that I may be free to touch them. For I do not mean Duke George by this, but only that he does not mean it to me. This I will have promised to E. C. F. G. in humble service. Hiemit GOtt befohlen, Amen. Saturday after St. Jacob's Day [July 29] 1531.

1197th Treaty of Peace of the Electors of Mainz and Palatinate, between the protesting estates and the Catholic ones, at Schweinfurt, April 2-5, 1532.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 303; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 1016; and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 367.

When, at the Imperial Diet in Augsburg in 1530, the protesting estates were given a serious, swift farewell, and Prince Joachim of Brandenburg, the first of that name, publicly stated in the Imperial Council that the Imperial Majesty and the Catholic estates were determined to turn their bodies, goods and blood to the eradication of the Lutheran doctrine, the protesting estates thought their best. Majesty and the Catholic estates were determined to turn their bodies, goods and blood to it, that the Lutheran doctrine should be eradicated: then the protesting estates also thought their best.

and afterwards at Schmalkalden and elsewhere had met for several days, and conferred with each other on a defense, so that they should be attacked and attacked on account of the Gospel. Therefore, since this would give rise to all kinds of noise, discord, and disruption in the German lands, the two Electors, Albrecht, Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz 2c., and Count Palatine Ludwig, to the Elector of Saxony and Landgrave of Hesse, have issued a decree to the Imperial Majesty of the Holy Roman Empire. Majest. They offered themselves as negotiators and mediators so that peace could be established between the protesting and Catholic estates, and that no estate would have to resort to violence before the other. Thereupon a day was set for Schweinfurt, where both Electors, Mainz and Palatinate, appeared in person, as well as Duke Johann Frederick of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse's advisors, and the act of peace was performed, as follows.

I.

Of the two Electors, Mainz and Palatinate, Lecture 2c.

1. our, Albrecht, Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz, and Ludwig, Count Palatine 2c., both Electors, as approved negotiators, concerns and proposals, how and in what way, in our hope, the disputed religious matters should and would be brought and preserved to a peaceful arrangement; of the Highborn Prince, our dear grandfather and cousin, Duke John Frederick of Saxony, instead of his dear father, also of our grandfather and cousin, the Landgrave of Saxony, and their related princes, counts, lords, and cities, now at this amicable day and action here at Schweinfurt, namely, whether it should be brought about, as both Electors have requested not to spare all possible diligence, as before.

(2) Initially, that the Elector of Saxony, his beloved son, Lord John Frederick, also the Landgrave of Hesse, and other of their beloved kinsmen, who have handed themselves over in writings at Augsburg in the Confession and Assension concerning our Christian faith, should not make any further nor any more innovations about the same Confession and Assension until a future Concilium.

(3) But that the said our dear uncle and cousin, the Elector of Saxony and Landgrave of Hesse, and their dearest kinsmen,

That they are not to be dependent on, or in attendance with, the Zwinglians and Anabaptists, nor to show favor to them. Neither shall any party of the other subjects in matters of faith draw upon themselves, nor be subject to maintain, accept, protect, and shield.

(4) That even our dear hosts and cousins, the Electors of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and their kinsmen, should refrain from preaching, and from preaching and publicizing, whether by word, printing, writing, or other means, matters pertaining to the faith, further and more than the Confession and Assension (delivered by them at the Diet of Augsburg) contains. And that neither one nor the other party shall preach, nor procure to be preached, outside their own and their fellow subject lands and territories, nor shall either party speak, say, or write anything grievous or blasphemous against the other.

(5) As far as the prelates' jurisdiction, customs and ceremonies are concerned, in the Dukes of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and their beloved neighboring lands and dominions, as well as in the ecclesiastical estates, because of which much unpleasantness has arisen up to now, it is our good pleasure and in accordance with equity that nothing new be done in this matter, but that the matter be conducted by such reasonable means and ways as may be found to be agreeable to the Imperial Majesty and to peace on all sides. Majesty and on all sides to be agreeable and conducive to peace.

(6) That also beforehand a common peace between those who persist in the old faith and the above-mentioned princes and chieftains, together with their co-relatives, may be and be maintained on both sides, and that with true friendship and Christian devotion, each one as much as is in him, may endeavor and procur that the council be held, as soon as convenient and possible, for the explanation and discussion of the disagreements and troubles which are in the faith; to which then the Imperial Majesty will doubtless hold her hand. Majesty will undoubtedly hold the hand of her fortune.

7. That also our dear hosts and cousins, the Dukes of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and their beloved kinsmen, will all and unanimously make every effort to be and serve the German nation for its welfare, security, peace, and comfort, also for the help, protection, and preservation of the same; to contribute to the resistance of the Turks, according to the content of the farewell, recently established at Augsburg, as they have indicated to do several times; in the same way their loved ones and their kinsfolk with the other princes and estates of the realm, the like, and so much more, as concerns matters of faith, the counsels, resolutions, and agreements of the imperial congresses, which have been made in various times and will be made in the future, and should comply with them.

(8) And if these things were to take place as reported above, also our dear families and cousins, the Dukes of Saxony, Hesse, and their kinsmen, would obey the Imperial Majesty and the Roman King without opposition. Majesty and the Roman King without opposition, also whether any understanding against their Imperial or Royal Majesty, or others of the old faith, has been raised, or others of the old faith, that they will drop them as invalid: we are of the consoling hope that their Imperial and Royal Majesties will also drop all displeasure and ill-will which their Majesties have conceived against them, put all past matters and grievances into oblivion, and remain their most gracious Emperor and Roman King, and graciously hold them in all their matters.

Scripture of the Evangelicals, wherein they desire a more detailed explanation of the foregoing discourse.

(1) On the means handed over to our friendly dear lords and cousins and most gracious lords, the Electors of Mainz and Palatinate, we kindly and humbly request further information and explanation for the sake of the following words and articles.

(2) For first, we understand these words, which are written in the first article: "And others of their kindred, who have entered into the confession and assension, delivered up in writings at Augsburg," 2c. that all we, the states and cities hereafter named, who have hitherto entered into the confession and made ourselves divisible, are thereby meant, viz:

3. the Elector of Saxony 2c. together with Duke Johann Friedrichen, his son, Margrave Georg of Brandenburg, Duke Philipp, Ernst and Franz, brothers and cousins, of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Landgrave Philipp of Hesse, Prince Wolfgang of Anhalt, Gebhard and Albrecht, brothers, counts and lords of Mansfeld. And the cities of Strasbourg, Norimberg, Constance, Ulm, Bibrach, Jßni, Reutlingen, Memmingen, Eßlingen, Lindau, Heilbrunn, Kempten, Weißenburg, Winsheim, Lübeck, Brunswick, Magdeburg, Bremen, Goslar, Eimbeck and Göttingen.

(4) Although the Concilii is thought of merely and not further, we nevertheless provide that the free, common, Christian Concilium is meant, of which some previous imperial treaties report, and the contents of which are to be held in the German nation at one of the places named therein.

(5) Thus the first article has these words: "that no further innovation shall be made concerning the confession in question until the future council. This is understood by us to refer only to the innovation in doctrine concerning the articles which have been taught and preached by our people up to the present time by virtue of the Confession, and not to any change in the customs and ceremonies which have been, or may be, performed in our country in accordance with and based on the doctrine stated in the Confession.

(6) There is a misunderstanding between us concerning the half-word of the third article, inasmuch as it is expressed, "that some party shall not draw to himself the other subjects in matters of faith, nor shall he be subject to entertain or accept them, Whether the article is meant only as long as they still live under another authority and abstain, or also if they leave the other authorities' lands, and have turned or want to turn under someone of our part, it is ecclesiastical order or other, secular people.

(7) In the fourth article are these words: "that the Elector of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and their kinsmen should refrain from preaching and publicizing, whether by word, printing, writing, or in other ways, things that affect the faith, further and more than this confession, which is delivered by our part at Augsburg, contains.

(8) Now the Augsburg Confession was a harmless summary of all the articles that had previously been taught, printed, preached, and written in this part. However, this does not include other abuses previously taught and publicized by our people by means of divine Scripture, as well as the information given against these abuses in the enclosed notes, which were issued by the Emperor at Augsburg after the confession had been printed, preached, and written. Maj. at Augsburg, after the reported Confession had been handed over, on Her Maj.'s commanding inquiry as to whether we wished to remain with the Articles of the Confession. Therefore the necessity requires to receive an explanation of the words touched upon, so that through misunderstanding no further errors may occur.

9 At the end of the same article there are these words: "that neither party against the other may do anything abusive".

or blasphemous things" 2c. Now, the well-known doctrine touched upon has for some time been considered heretical, and ours have been accused of being heretics, and of other blasphemous invectives, and do not understand it otherwise than that it should henceforth be shunned.

10th In the fifth article, the prelates' jurisdiction, customs and ceremonies, in the Dukes of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and their related lands and dominions, as well as the ecclesiastical estates, it is proposed: "that the things be drawn up in such proper ways and means as may be found, that they may serve the imperial Majesty and all for peace. 2c., without it being stated what these proper ways and means could be, so that in the future, if the ecclesiastics or others want to insist on them, and they could not be imposed on this part of their intention, as can easily be considered, no new and further misconduct may arise from it.

(11) In the sixth article it is said, "that a good common peace shall be maintained between those who persist in the old faith and the above-mentioned princes and rulers, together with their kinsmen, ...there is some doubt, in that the words...: "so remain in the old faith," are added to the other part; which should be heard, if it should have the sense, as otherwise the words almost read, as if we had departed from the old faith, which we nevertheless have on this part; but do so [teach and preach it] as God has proclaimed and preached it to the world through His prophets, and later through His only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, our Savior, and His apostles, [as we] 1) can show and prove in the contents of our Confession and Apology. For to add anything of this or any other form to the Christian and known doctrine and God's Word would be burdensome, and would not at all suit us with God and our conscience.

(12) Further, in the reported sixth article, there follow these words: "Let every one, as much as he may care, procure that the council be held, as soon as it may be convenient and possible, for the explanation and discussion of the dissensions and grievances which are in the faith, in which the Imperial Majesty will, without doubt, take a hand of her fortune. Majesty will undoubtedly hold the hand of her fortune." From this we do not how it is to be understood "that each one, as much as is in him, shall endeavor and procure that the Council be kept", since several previous Imperial Treaties already report the same, together with what the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, especially at the last Imperial Diet at Speier, by Her Majesty's Orators and Commissars, has already said. Our most gracious Lord, especially at the last Imperial Diet at Speier, has graciously granted and put off by Her Majesty's Orators and Commissars to the Princes, Princes and Estates, of which Her Majesty was also reminded several times at the next Imperial Diet held by Her Majesty at Augsburg, with further necessary notices.

1) This and the preceding addition seemed to us necessary to make sense.

(13) After such requested declaration we want to let ourselves be heard by the Almighty of our necessity of the done proposals.

III.

The declaration given hereupon by Churpfalz and Mainz.

1. our, Albrecht, Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz 2c., and Ludwig, Count Palatine of the Rhine, both Electors and approved negotiators, further report and explanation, on some words and articles in our proposed means, by the Highborn Prince, our dear grandfather and cousin, Mr. Johann Friedrich, Duke of Saxony, on account of his dear father, also the landgraval councillors, and others of these matters in doubt, according to a list, therefore sent and handed over to us.

(2) Initially on the words, incorporated in the first proposed point, of the content that the Elector of Saxony, the son of his dearest love, Duke John Frederick, also Landgrave of Hesse, "and other of their dearest kinsmen, who in the Confession and Assension, concerning our Christian faith, have handed themselves over in writings at Augsburg," (2c.) we, the Electors, are concerned that all those who have handed themselves over in the above-mentioned Confession and Assension, and compare themselves with them, will also remain as they are now, We, the Electors, are concerned that all those who have entered into the above-mentioned confession and assension, and who compare themselves with them, remain in this action as they have now submitted themselves by name, and that we also insist with Imperial Majesty that all those who have submitted themselves by name are to be treated as Christians. Majesty that all of them, as they are now indicated to us here in writings, will be conceded in such an agreement, as it gains its progress, and that we will act with the best of diligence.

(3) In response to our uncle and cousin, Duke John Frederick, and his dear kinsmen, "that in the above-mentioned Articles the Concilii is merely thought of," 2c. we may well remember what was said before at the Imperial Diet that such a Christian Concilium, as we have called it, is not a Christian Concilium.

It is our opinion that it should not be held by one nation, but that a settlement must be reached with Papal Holiness and other high Christian potentates, each of whom believes to have such a council in the same nation. Therefore, if these things are to be endured and maintained in accordance with our proposals, we are obliged to apply to His Imperial Majesty with all our best diligence. Maj. with all our best diligence, as we do not doubt that Her Imperial Majesty will be inclined to support us. Maj. will be inclined to promote and help whether such a council, as much as possible, should be held in the near future in German lands or within the borders thereof.

4th And concerning the words in the first article, "that no further innovation should be made about the reported assension and confession," and what is indicated for the sake of the ceremonies by our dear grandparents and cousins, and their relatives, besides, such words, and how it is meant for the sake of the ceremonies, are reported, further declared, and explained in the article of jurisdiction, ceremonies, and spiritual goods.

(5) Furthermore, the third article states that "neither party shall take to itself the other's subjects in matters of faith," (2c) such an article is for the constant preservation of unity for the sake of peace, and is therefore established. Where, however, special and private persons, out of one party's authority, and with the same knowledge and will, wish to go to another place, and would appear to be accepted thereupon by the other party, this article is not to be contravened.

(6) To the words of the fourth article, "that the Elector of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and their kinsmen in the matter, abstain from preaching, and from preaching and publicizing" 2c. The above point has the meaning with us that their loved ones and the others are not to preach, teach, write or have printed any further, for as much as their confession and assension can, according to the same and no further 2c.

(7) To the words of the above-mentioned fourth article, "that neither party shall speak or write anything defamatory or blasphemous against the other" 2c. In this it is our opinion, and fairly observed, that neither party shall offend the other with profanity or blasphemy in preaching, writing, printing, or otherwise speaking, as may be done, as set forth in the article, and that every authority shall thus keep the same with his own in earnest, for the sake of more peace.

8. on the fifth article, "the prelates' jurisdiction, customs and ceremonies 2c. be appropriate" . Although this article is considered by many estates to be most burdensome, but nevertheless, so that good peace and unity may be preserved until the future Concilio, and as far as the other articles and proposals also take place and are preserved, we are of the comforting hope to obtain this point from Imperial Majesty. Majesty in this way:

(9) That, as far as the prelates' jurisdiction, custom, and ceremonies are concerned, in the lands and dominions of the Dukes of Saxony, of the Landgrave of Hesse, and of their kindreds, as well as in the ecclesiastical estates, nothing shall be innovated in that which now exists until the next Concilium.

10 And when in the sixth article the words, viz: "2c., we give this report, that such words are used solely for the distinction of the parties, and not to burden anyone with them. Nor is our mind to speak of who is of the old or new faith, but to act in peaceable decency until future Concilio. But in the event that our dear grandparents and cousins, and their relatives, should ever find such words burdensome, they shall be provided for, namely: that good common peace be maintained between both parties. 2c.

(11) Finally, when doubts have arisen as to how each party should proceed (1) so that the Council may be held as soon as convenient, it is to be understood that both parties, in addition to the Imperial Majesty and other estates of the realm, should persevere and endeavor as much as possible to promote the holding of such Council. Maj. and other estates of the realm, shall persevere, and as much as in them, endeavor, and promote, that such Concilium, as may be most convenient, shall be held. The undoubted confidence that Imperial Maj. Maj. will not let any lack or delay appear in it, as has been done and sought in many ways by Her Majesty.

1198. d. Mart. Luther's cry to the Elector Prince John Frederick not to refuse the peace offered. February 12, 1532.

1) "procuriren" put by us instead of: "provociren", according to the preceding writing, No. I, Z6 and No. II, s 12.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord John Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my gracious Lord.

1. grace and peace in Christ. Sublime, highborn Prince, gracious Lord! The Chancellor, O. Brück, has sent me the articles that the two Electors of Mainz and Palatinate are to act on by imperial command. Maj.'s command, are to act on a treaty between this part of the Princes and the Emperor 2c., and I have indicated to him my opinion as to how they are to be well suffered and accepted. Since I believe that God hears our prayer, meets and greets us with grace and peace, and would now like to hear a humble answer, I have not failed to write to E. F. G. and to present my humble request.

2. for I must fear that the one article of the king 2c. E. F. G. might want to move, and seem burdensome, and that not without cause, as now everyone is well aware. But, my lord, because E. F. G.'s virtuous deed and resistance to the king's unjust choice has been widely heard and known to all the world, the king's and everyone's injustice has been sufficiently punished, and E. F. G. together with her theologians have been punished. F. G. together with her part is sufficiently and abundantly pardoned, so I will humbly and for God's sake have asked E. F. G. to let such article go henceforth, to God's praise and honor, and not to let it hinder peace and treaty.

(3) For the F.F.G. himself can well consider that if it should come to war, and even if it did well, peace would have to be made in the end, because such wars cannot be eternal; and then, after such damage and misery, the same peace would perhaps have to be accepted with more annoying and more difficult means than it is now being offered. Moreover, even now E. F. G. sees how firmly and surely the cities and alliances hold, that it is nothing else but splendid thoughts and exquisite proposals, which seem almost comforting, because there is no need; but when it comes to the encounter, it all turns to water, and there is no one at home; so then no citizen nor city can be found, who can ask for peace.

004 For this very reason also such comfort and confidence are dangerous and harmful (not to say unchristian), because they teach and accustom the heart to rely on the help and counsel of men. Which. God finally does not suffer, but certainly puts to shame. It is true that the help of men, where God gives and gives it, is not evil; but to seek it, or to rely on it, and to begin something, has never been well done, and never will be.

(5) But now that the emperor, as an authority ordained by God, has so graciously given himself, and has so mildly given a free order to make peace, it is truly not to be regarded otherwise than as if God were offering us his gracious hand. And it is time that we do not let him stretch out his hand in vain, which would make him highly distressed, as he laments in Proverbs 1.

6th So it is also E. F. G.'s length not sorry that the longer the longer the displeasure and resentment of that part grows. He who is not a prince, since more is at stake than in a single person, is easy to defy and expect wars; for he has not much to lose, or at least comes out of the mud more easily than the prince himself, whom he has led into it.

But I have become too wise and talk too much. E. F. G. would graciously credit me with it. For I do it out of humble concern and loyalty to E. F. G., as my dear Prince. I will hope and trust that E. F. G. will do better than I think. For this I will also call upon God's help with earnestness, and faithfully pray for E. F. G.. For it is he who must begin, continue and complete what is to become good. Man's thoughts are of no use, saith the Psalter. Christ, our light and life of love, be with us forever, amen. 1199 D. Mart. Luther's two letters to the Elector John of Saxony concerning the peace treaty.

a. First letter, because of the action at Schweinfurt. In Feb. 1532.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 472; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 495; in the Altenburg edition, vol. V, p. 960; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 363; in the Erlangen edition, vol. 54, p. 269, and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 335.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord John, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ our Lord. Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! D. Brück, E. C. F. G. Chancellor, has now again indicated to me the articles, as before, on which the two Electors 2c. are to act with E. C. F. G., between Kais. Maj. and E. C. F. G. to make a treaty or peace, and thereupon on account of E. C. F. G. my concern requested 2c.

(2) Therefore this is my humble concern, that such articles are well and acceptable. And whether some of them are still obscure or suspicious, I think, if it came to action, everything would be clear and certain. And indeed (as far as I understand myself), it seems to me to be the earnestness and right opinion of the two Electors, since they have received such a broad and free command from the Emperor to act, and have also used Count Palatine Frederick for this purpose in such a message, so that they may indicate that it has been important to them, and still is.

Because the matter has now come to such a point that nothing would prevent such a treaty and peace, except perhaps the article of the king 2c., my humble request is that E. C. F. G. should give the same to Christ and let him go. If he is unjustly chosen, he is quite atoned for it until therefore.

Thus also E. C. F. G. has sufficiently contradicted such injustice, and has shown himself well against it. One must also allow this Christian article to rule, which is called forgiveness.

Of sins. Otherwise, when one blows his nose too hard, blood follows, and when anger is urged, strife arises. It will remain in the world that many things are done wrong, and when they are done, they must remain unchanged, as the law teaches, to prevent greater harm.

(5) And this is also to be highly considered, that God has given us such causes for peace, that He perhaps intends to further His Gospel with it and through it, and yet we are guilty of denying and abandoning ourselves as well, where we can praise and promote God's honor, name and word. All of which is to be prevented by strife, and perhaps the contradiction would come, so that we, too, would be prevented or deprived of the Gospel through war and strife.

006 Christ our Lord, to whom these things are given in honour, shall make E. C. F. G. glorious again, as he promised: so saith and teacheth St. Paul Rom. 12:18, that we Christians, as much as it is in us, should keep peace with every man. This is so much as to say, that we ought to leave our rights for the sake of peace, that we may not lack it. For peace is more important than justice; indeed, justice is established for the sake of peace.

7th For, since God for fei! where the treaty should be hindered, for the sake of this article, then it must finally follow that a war will result, whether the Emperor remains in the country or not 2c. And E. C. F. G. would have to be the cause of such a war, without necessity, which would be an unmistakable burden in the conscience, if the rebuke would come and bite afterwards, namely: "Why did I not leave my right and accept peace, so that such great misfortune and misery would not come? And if it should come to pass, that the kingdom should be rent asunder, and given to the Turks, and both the gospel and all things should perish.

008 Thus we also see how there is no loyalty among foreign kings, and how the cities are mighty of their citizens when it comes to a meeting, as has often been experienced, and now the people of Zurich are a strong example. For I know that God does not allow such alliances.

And he also causeth them not to hold: as all the prophets are full of them. For they are only the thoughts and actions of men, made without the word and command of God, out of their own folly. Therefore it is not possible that they should keep and not fail in the time of trouble. The Scripture says, "All men are liars," that is, they do not help but fail. And in the land of Egypt Isaiah calls it a broken reed, which passeth through the hand of him that trusteth in it. We have a divine cause, which God alone will and must preserve, as he has done up to now; the thoughts of men truly do not.

(9) Such my humble concern E. C. F. G. would graciously credit me with; for I also mean well, God knows that, and hope that I am not speaking out of human shards. The merciful Father enlighten and strengthen E. C. F. G. to do his good will, amen, amen.

b. Second letter, concerning the peace negotiations at Nuremberg.

June 29, 1532.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 473; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 496; in the Altenburg edition, vol. V, p. 971; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 364; in the Erlangen edition, vol. 54, p. 312, and in De Wette, vol. I V, p. 382. This letter refers, as both De Wette and Burkhardt testify, to Nuremberg, not as Planf III, 1. 223, to the convent at Schweinfurt.

Grace and peace in Christ. Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! Here I send the trades to E. C. F. G. again, with our humble concern.

002 And because I find in all things, that some of our people desire to be too wise and certain, and, as their words are, to have an undisputable peace, I cannot indeed think otherwise than that they have no desire for peace, or else (which is as much) are striving after an impossible peace.

003 For where is any contract, right, bargain, seal, or letter ever made, drawn up, or given? or erected, since one could not argue against it, or make a hole through it? If we are so exact and sure of our own jokes, and do not trust everything to God, and let him have his way, nothing good will come of it, and we will be according to the saying of Solomon: "He who blows his nose too hard draws blood, and he who spurns what is small does not get what is greater.

(4) Indeed, where Imperial Majesty grants such articles as we have now changed in the one amendment. Majesty grants such articles as we have now changed in the one addition (to take protection from other persons fleeing to us), His Imperial Majesty has done enough, and for this both blame and disgrace will be ours. Majesty has done enough, and both blame and displeasure will be ours. For God greets us graciously; if we do not thank him, we will sin greatly and have no happiness.

(5) Accordingly, I most humbly ask E. C. F. G. to write a good, hard letter to ours, and faithfully admonish them to see how much and graciously the Imperial Majesty yields to us, which we may well accept with a clear conscience. Maj. yields to us, which we may well accept with a good conscience; in addition, His Imperial Majesty himself does not accept the King's matters. Majesty himself does not want the King's things mixed up, and will not refuse such gracious peace for the sake of a few pointed, precisely sought points, God will (when the main parts proceed with peace) heal and provide for such minor requested deficiencies. They will not divide the purpose, nor is it necessary, but it is enough that one shoots close to it. All our life and deeds, both against God and man (as full of infirmities), must be borne by toleration and forgiveness of sins.

006 And if we were to be so godly and so pious toward God and toward our neighbors, and so pure and entire, we would never be blessed, nor would we ever be at peace with our neighbors. If they have an earnest desire for peace, they may well accept such pieces (as I have said). But if they have a desire for discord, then they must have neither our counsel nor our consideration. They can easily be wise enough to cause misfortune, but still that we do not approve of it; they may eat it up, but they cause too much. I for mine own

I) "Purpose" --- Centrum of the disc.

Person wants to sincerely thank Majesty cordially thank, where His Imperial Majesty grants such articles. Majesty grants such articles.

(7) In something fraudulent among them, which the moth does not give after all, and it is not my place to create suspicion against His Imperial Majesty, much less His Imperial Majesty. Majesty, much less to interpret and misinterpret his Imperial Majesty's opinion. If I am to interpret and judge his imperial majesty's opinion unknowingly, then I command him who knows, judges and directs all hearts, who will protect me in such a journey and keep me harmless. For this I know for certain, whoever deceives the trusting heart toward God, the love toward his neighbor, deceives himself, and faith and love remain without harm.

008 And if such a peace make no more, yet this would be a great and mighty fruit, that therewith the papists, our enemies, would be put down their oppression, defiance, throbbing, and prancing. Which would be a great heartache and torment enough for them.

(9) By God, most gracious Lord, I know nothing more to do nor to say in this matter. If strife and war result from this, above such gracious command of Imperial Majesty, then we are truly innocent of all the evil that may come from it. Majesty, then we are truly innocent of all the evil that may come from it.

God has mercifully heard our poor prayer and gives us peace. May the same dear Father continue to grant us a thankful heart that may recognize, accept and well use such grace, to His praise and honor, Amen. To the same faithful benevolent God I command E. C. F. G. with my little prayer faithfully and diligently. At Wittenberg, on St. Peter's and Paul's day s29. June] Anno 1532.

1200: The final peace proposals made to the princely papal negotiators by the Protestants. June 10, 1532.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 309; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 1023; and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 375.

1st Initially that the Elector of Saxony, his son Duke Friederich, and their co-relatives, namely Margrave George of Brandenburg, Phi lipp, Ernst and Franz, brothers and cousins, Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Landgrave Philip of Hesse, Ernst Wolfgang of Anhalt, Gebhard and Albrecht, brothers, Counts of Mansfeld, and the cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Constance, Bibrach, Jsni, 1) Reutlingen, Esslingen, Memmingen, Lindau, Heilbronn, Hall in Swabia, Kempten, Weißenburg, Winsheim, Lübeck, Braunschweig, Magdeburg, Bremen, Goslar, Eimbeck, Göttingen, Nordhausen and Hamburg, who have committed themselves to the Confession, Assension and Apology, concerning our holy Christian faith, have handed over in writings at Augsburg, shall not make any further or other innovation, nor any ceremonies contrary or inappropriate to the same Confession, Assension and Apology, nor what is in accordance with the same according to right Christian, reasonable understanding, until a future, common, Christian Concilio, as decided and promised at the first Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg; for which Concilium the Imperial Majesty should be requested Majesty should be requested to take care that it is acted upon in German lands. That also the above-mentioned Elector of Saxony, together with his son Duke Frederick, and their kinsmen, should use faithful and good diligence to procure and hold such a Concilium.

(2) Secondly, that the Elector of Saxony, his son, Duke John Frederick, and the above-mentioned relatives of theirs do not wish to follow or support the Zwinglians and Anabaptists on account of their doctrine and faith, nor, if they persist in their error, to show them any favor or encouragement, but to renounce them. In the event, however, that they abandon their error, and join forces with Imperial Majesty and other commoners, they are to be punished. In the event, however, that they abandon their error, and want to join in faith with the Imperial Majesty and other common estates of the Empire, or want to accept the confession and assension of the princes and their followers, as handed over at Augsburg, then they are to be included and included in this confession, which is now to be established.

(3) That Saxony and its kinsmen, and the other estates of the realm, shall not take possession of any party of the other subjects in matters of faith, nor shall they be subject to maintain, accept, protect, or shield them against the will of the other. Where, however, special and private or other persons who would otherwise not be subject to arrest on account of their person or goods, or where there would be a free move, and who hold the faith, they shall not be subject to arrest.

1) "Isni" set by us (after No. 1187 and 1202) instead of: "Resim".

Those who did not want to or could not stay behind one dominion for a longer period of time (unless they had other causes and faults on them), should not be refused to move away behind another dominion upon their request to the same authority and with their prior knowledge, even usual payment, additional tax and other things that they would owe according to local usage, in which no danger would be used. However, Saxony and her kinsmen do not want to have their part taken away from them or deprived of their faith and confession by this agreement.

(4) The said Elector of Saxony and his son, and their kinsmen, shall also refrain from preaching, publicizing, or sending forth, whether by word, printing, writing, or other means, in matters of faith, further or more than their above-mentioned confession, assension, and apology are capable of, and in accordance with their right, reasonable, Christian understanding. And that neither one nor the other party shall not preach or provide for preaching outside their and their fellow sovereignties and territories, unless one or more princes travel outside their sovereignties, sovereignties and territories, and are granted to preach by the authorities of each place. But if it were granted, they would then be able to preach for themselves and their own in their inns.

005 But if it be in campaigns and camps, that, to prevent further mischief and offence, which might arise out of doubtful doctrine, no more than the holy gospel should be written by all parts of the time, badly according to the text, and without any further addition, in a special place, and only for those who are of its appendage. But the Holy Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, at all times when their conscience and necessity require it, in and out of their principalities and territories, they and their own to receive it in both forms, and also, as aforesaid, in their inns, until the future Council, shall be unimpaired.

(6) It is also deemed proper, and conducive to peace and unity, that neither party should reproach the other with speeches, preaching, writing, or other such ways. The preachers, however, each as is appropriate and due, may correct, punish, and attract the vices, sins, and unrighteous teachings in general through Christian, moderate instruction, without abuse and scolding.

007 And when the duke of Saxony, together with his attendants, in their harmless opposition and proposals, if at times people had to be elected to the Imperial Court of Appeal, or otherwise to other Imperial Majesty's and the Empire's business and offices from the circles. The court has been asked to decide whether it is necessary to elect people to the Imperial Court of Appeal or to other Imperial and Imperial business and offices from the circles, so that those of their confession would be sabotaged and therefore the less likely to be accepted as being in the highest degree of grievance; it is therefore considered expedient for a peaceful standstill that the persons who have their loved ones and their dependents ordered and appointed to the Imperial Court of Appeal on their account, or who will subsequently be ordered and appointed to the Imperial Court of Appeal, be allowed to continue in their duties. It is considered for a peaceful standstill that the persons who have their loved ones and their relatives ordered and appointed by them to the Imperial Court of Appeal, or subsequently appointed and appointed, and are finally used in their business as advocates, procuratores, and the like, are not to be shunned, nor suspended from their offices and services, or dismissed, or even elected or accepted in circles for this reason.

(8) The ecclesiastical jurisdiction of each place shall remain in the state in which it is at present in the said Electorate and Princes of Saxony and their kindred lands and territories.

(9) Likewise, whether some vindication concerning the discord of faith has been made at the Imperial Chamber Court, the Court of Rothweil, the Westphalian Court, the Swabian Union, or elsewhere. Chamber Court, the Court of Rothweil, the Westphalian Court, the Swabian Confederation, or elsewhere, and whether judgments have been rendered therein, which have not yet come to execution, they shall also be postponed and prorogued until the future Council.

010 Concerning the goods and incomes of the clergy, let every man keep his own, which he hath and useth now, and let him alone; and let no man be taken away by force or affliction from another.

11. But the dedicated uses, goods, rents, interest, tithes and dues, which each party, foundation, prelature and monastery in the other's principality, country, dominions, authorities and territories, would have fallen, shall be transferred unrestricted, unbidden and without any remedy, as it would have been in the mentioned foundations, prelatures and monasteries in each part for the sake of religion, to the places where the same foundations, prelatures and monasteries were located, The same shall henceforth also be given and follow in the places where the said monasteries, prelatures, and convents are located, and where they have been given and followed from time immemorial, until further providence in a much-determined concilio.

(12) However, each prince, sovereign, estate and superior of their principality, territory and dominion shall be entitled without interruption to the property, land and ground belonging thereto, also to the tax, consequence, rendition, 1) rescue, assistance and other authorities and righteousnesses of the princes, sovereigns and sovereigns of their principality, territory and dominion.

The provisions of this law shall be completely unbreakable and harmless in respect of the special contracts, settlements or understandings which have been made and established between certain princes, princes and estates for the sake of such or such interest, tithes and estates.

(13) And that good common peace and unity, which is the greatest principal of these things, and which is sought by this negotiation, may be the more nobly maintained between the Roman Imperial and Royal Majesty and all the estates of the Roman Empire of the German Nation, every estate, regardless of the discord of faith, otherwise in other external and secular matters, shall first of all obey the Imperial and Royal Majesty in all possible matters of equity and deceit, and every estate of the Empire, so far as it is concerned, shall otherwise hold itself against each other with true friendship and Christian devotion. Majesty in all possible, just and deceptive matters, and each imperial estate, as much as is in it, shall otherwise treat each other with true friendship and Christian devotion, and shall endeavor and promote everything that can and may serve the German nation for its welfare, security, peace and comfort. In particular, the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen, together with the other estates of the empire, shall show themselves helpful and salvageable in resisting and opposing the Turk; in these and other matters of necessity incumbent upon the empire, which do not concern the faith, they shall compare in imperial assemblies and councils in a friendly and equitable manner, and what is thus unanimously considered, decided, and adopted as good, as has been the custom since time immemorial, shall be complied with by all parts.

(14) By this above-mentioned, a common good peace shall be worked and established between the Roman Imperial and Royal Majesty and our most gracious Lord and all the estates of the realm, to be kept by both parts altogether and against each in particular; one part hereof, contrary to the peace of the land, the order of the realm, as well as law and equity, for the sake of certain things, no one shall be violated, nor shall he be burdened with the deed.

(15) And for a good decision, if the matters come to execution as above stated, the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, should be requested and induced that her Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, should be granted the power to issue the decree. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, should be requested and moved that Her Imperial Majesty from the Imperial Palace of the Holy Roman Empire should be granted the right. Majesty out of imperial clemency Majesty, out of Imperial clemency, be the more inclined to hear and graciously show himself against all the estates as their rightful lord in their matters and grievances, this peaceful decency, which for the sake of faith (if it is accepted and preserved, as above affirmed), by Imperial kindness, and out of his own motion, is to be respected. kindness, and of his own motion, nor at anyone's instigation, nor of his own free will.

serl. Power and Perfection, create nothing against it, and graciously establish such a peaceful decency, indicated measure, in the Empire of the German Nation, execute it, and insure it in the best form 2c.

Delivered at Nuremberg, 1) Monday after, Bonif. [10. June] Anno 1532.

1201 D. Martin Luther's counsel together with Bugenhagen on the means proposed by the two Electors in the peace treaty at Schweinfurt. May 1532.

The original of this thought in Luther's manuscript is in the Weimar Archives, LeZ. H, p. 64. 14; from it in De Wette, vol. IV, 372, and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 54, p. 304, with the time determination: "April or May," but Burkhardt assigns it, according to its location in the archives, with certainty to May. Also still in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 307, and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 372. We give the text according to De Wette.

From these words in the first article, "and other 2c. who would engage."

001 We have again, with all diligence, moved this article with the words, "and others 2c. who would enter into it. And since it is well to be observed that it cannot be preserved by the opposite, we cannot advise that one should dispute, and thereby overthrow the whole act of peace, since one may yet drop the same addition without burdening his conscience.

002 To overthrow that which is necessary, and to let it fall, because of that which is unnecessary, is contrary to God and conscience. Now this is to be considered necessary, if a tolerable peace is offered us, that we give no cause for war.

(3) But that it may be said against it, that this addition cannot be dropped with God and conscience, because thereby the gospel is increased to others. Item, Christians should seek the salvation and welfare of others 2c.

4. well is not without, you can use this high

1) Walch, Inhaltsverzeichnis des 16. Vol., p. 64, remarks on this that the Leipzig edition had made a mistake by putting "Norimberg" instead of "Schweinfurt". But the Leipzig edition is right, for the convention at Schweinfurt broke up already in the middle of May. See De Wette, Vol. IV, p. 382.

But yet the truth is in the ground that we may drop such addition with God and conscience, for we do not hereby consent that the gospel should be forbidden or increased to others, but seek a temporal peace for ourselves, neither ought we nor can we justly compel other authorities that they should secure theirs to our liking; wherefore we may with good conscience accept a peace, though the future be not already secured. As Paul saith [Rom. 12:18.], Quantum in nolis 68t, PN66M eain omnibus bominibus babsntss, "as much as is in you, keep peace with all men."

005 Secondly, Christians ought to seek the salvation and welfare of others, as far as they are able and just. If, then, we cannot, by kindly seeking and exhorting, obtain that the emperor should secure his own, we can do no more, and are excused; for we cannot and ought not to compel the emperor or other tributary princes to secure theirs. If a prince were to ask for two Christians whom another prince wanted to punish, and one of them were released for the sake of that prince, the prince would have to be satisfied and let the other one be punished, and yet that prince would have done a good deed by saving one of them.

006 As Abdias received many prophets, [1 Kings 18:13] and yet saw that many were slain beside them. It is enough that every prince in his land is an Abdias. This figure is in all the ways of the present case.

007 Thirdly, we have also sought the salvation of others, that we may be permitted to send preachers to other places. Item, that also the people under other authority may sell 2c. This is a great benefit, for their life and limb is saved.

008 Fourthly, every Christian is bound to believe and confess the gospel in his own way, as Christ saith [Matt. 16:24], "If any man will come after me, let him take up his cross," that is, let him not lay his cross upon another.

009 Fifthly, cfuoā tibi non vis ūsri, nlteri ne kseoris, what thou wouldest not that it should be done to thee, thou shalt not do to others. Now no authority of this part wanted that other tributary princes should force them to do what they wanted with their subjects.

010 And I hold it to be clearly decided in every Christian mind, that this addition is not to be disputed.

011 And I am just concerned that it may be a challenge to some who may seek something else in it; as we men may easily be challenged and deceived by ourselves, for the old Adam is not entirely dead in us. I cannot put my confidence in the danger of bloodshed and other great harm to Christendom, which must follow if a noise were made of it. For be it what it may, true doctrine is lost in such a wild and abominable nature. Therefore, be careful not to drop the main and the necessary because of the unnecessary.

(12) It is possible to cavil a little from the Concilio; so without doubt it is sufficiently caved in by these words: "A free, Christian Concilium. "If the words do not help, the addition, "according to the pure word of God," 2c. will also help little. For if the Xationss conclude against us, they will nevertheless want to have the glory that they speak according to the pure Word of God 2c.

Thirteen: See and do him not too much. Hui Minium smunAil, slieU sunAuinsin; he who wants too much gets too little.

1202 Nuremberg First Religious Peace, given July 23 Anno 1532.

This writing came out still in the year 1532 separately and is printed afterwards in Latin in Dumonts oorp. āiplona, ioM. IV, pari. II, p.87 and in Goldast's oonst. imp., part. II, p. 172. German in Hortleder, "von den Ursachen" 2c., tom. I, lib. I, onp. 20, p. 67; in Lehmann's not. pn6. roliA., lib. I, oap. I, and in Lünig's ReichsArchiv, pnrt. M". oont. I, p. 389. This writing is reprinted in Walch's old edition in No. 1252 of the 17th volume, col. 38-46. We have omitted it there.

By the Grace of God we Albrecht, of the Holy Roman Church of the title 8an6ti ?6tri ack vineula Priest-Cardinal, and born Legate, at

Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, Archchancellor and Primate in Germania, Administrator of Halberstadt, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., and Ludwig, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria, Archduke of the Holy Roman Empire, both Electors, publicly confess and declare with this present farewell.

(1) When between the Most Sublime Prince and Lord, Lord Carl, Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire, 2c., our most gracious lord, on the one hand, and the highborn princes, our dear cousins and uncle, Mr. Johannsen, duke of Saxony, elector, and duke Johann Friedrichen, his dear son; Mr. Georgen, margrave of Brandenburg; Mr. Philipp, Ernten and Franzen, brothers and cousins, dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg; prince Wolfgang zu Anhalt; Gebharden and Albrechten, counts of Mansfeld; and the cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Constance, Ulm, Bibrach, Isni, Reutlingen, Esslingen, Memmingen, Lindau, Heilbronn, Hall in Swabia, Kempten, Weißenburg, Winsheim, Lübeck, Brunswick, Magdeburg, Bremen, Goslar, Eimbeck, Göttingen, Nordhausen, and Hamburg, For this reason, at the imperial congresses held here before, various actions were taken and sought as to how one might come to an equitable settlement of such errors and misunderstandings, which, however, have not yet occurred.

(2) And so, for the preservation of unity and peace in the Holy Empire, and especially so that the common enemy of Christendom, the Turk, may be met the more nobly, and his cruel tyrannical actions against the Christian blood, and especially the German nation, may be averted, we will strike at the matter in a completely submissive, faithful, good opinion, and, upon Imperial Majesty's gracious permission, also upon her Imperial Highness. Maj.'s gracious permission, also to Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty's authority, instruction and order sent to us for this purpose, and of our grandparents and cousins, and their relatives, the aforementioned consent, initially at Schweinfurt, and subsequently all here at Nuremberg, manifold kind actions are cultivated.

(3) Since the matter of faith could not be brought to a settlement by various actions, we have taken it into our minds that the tyrannical, cruel authorities of the Turk should not be resisted in any way, for if a lasting, common peace were to be established in the Holy Roman Empire, we therefore most humbly request and entreat Her Majesty to do so.

004 That therefore upon such our practised subjection humbly requesting and requesting that the Roman Emperor, Maj. Maj, our most gracious lord, the supreme head in the holy realm, out of special affection and desire, so to her Maj. and all the estates of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, ecclesiastical and secular, until a common, free, Christian concilio, as such was decided at Nuremberg at the Imperial Diet, or so that it would not have its continuation until the common estates of the Empire were called and described again in a convenient place; as is then understood in a special article, thus:

5. That in the meantime of the same concilio, or that the estates, as now reported, come to each other again and are otherwise consulted, no one insult the other of the faith or otherwise for any other reason, wage war, 1) do not threaten, nor descend some castles, cities, markets, fortifications, villages, farms or hamlets, or without the other's will with mighty deeds take them by force, or dangerously damage them with fire or other ways in such a way, nor give them any advice, help or other assistance, nor knowingly and dangerously harbor them, house them, etc. them, water them, contain them or tolerate them, but each shall mean the other with true friendship and Christian love.

(6) Which now mentioned common peace the Emperor's Majesty has signed. Maj. to proclaim and announce it to all estates in the Holy Empire, and to order it to be kept at the same heavy, considerable penalty, and also to use gracious diligence that the above-mentioned council be advertised and publicized within half a year, and then held within a year; and in case this should not be obtained, that then the common estates of the realm be summoned and described to each other again at a convenient place to deliberate what is to be done and acted upon for the sake of the said council and other necessary matters.

(7) For this purpose, the Roman Imperial Majesty has graciously granted and promised that Her Majesty will grant all justifications in matters of faith. Majesty has graciously granted and promised, for the greater and more lasting preservation of the aforementioned common peace, that Her Majesty will cease all justifications in matters of faith, which have been or may yet be begun by Her Majesty's Fiscal and others against the Elector of Saxony and her relatives, until such time as they have been restored. Fiscal and others against the Elector of Saxony and her dependents, or may yet be commenced, will cease until

1) "bekriegen" put by us instead of: "betriegen". The former is found in the parallel passage of the Imperial Mandate, No. 1208, § 3, and in the duplicate of this writing in No. 1252 of the 17th volume.

The Emperor's Majesty has graciously sent us an assurance of this by means of her gracious letter. Majesty will graciously send us an assurance of this, by virtue of her gracious letter, to our hands.

(8) On the other hand, our above-mentioned cousins and neighbors, Saxony, Lüneburg, and those close to them, shall and will steadfastly and firmly maintain such common peace on their part, neither do nor act contrary to it in any way, and also show obedience to Imperial Majesty. Maj. to show submissive and due obedience, also to render and send their due assistance in resisting the Turk, as has been granted and agreed by the common estates, in the same way as they have offered and allowed themselves to be heard of in their answer, which they have handed over to us in writing.

(9) And after our grandparents and cousins reported in the same their answer of some words in the last imperial letters. Majest. Order and Articles, and kindly and humbly requested us to bring such complaint to the Imperial Majesty by a skillful message, and to use our best endeavors to prevent it. Majesty by a skillful message, and to use good diligence to obtain a gracious change therein. To urge and request the same, so that the insurance we send to Her Majesty's copy may also be executed in the most beneficial way and come to our hands; and what is thus obtained from Imperial Majesty, or what is sent to us, may also be sent to us. Majesty, or will arise for answer, that we shall and want to open and make known to our cousin and uncle, the Elector of Saxony, in writings in the most beneficial way. Whatever her Majesty would grant and forbear, that shall be and remain in force, as if this were understood in this farewell from word to word. In the event, however, that the Imperial Majesty If, however, Her Imperial Majesty does not wish to make any further concessions or changes, this agreement shall nevertheless be and remain in force, and its contents shall be carried out and complied with, without any extracts and remedies, but without any danger.

(10) And because the Highborn Prince, Mr. Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, our dear cousin and uncle, also had his envoys, namely Johann Feigen von der Liechtenau, Chancellor, Siegmund von Beineburg, Bailiff of the Werra, and Johann Walther, Doctor, at this action, the same envoys have indicated that it is not their time to accept this parting; as they have therefore handed over to us their causes and complaints in writings, and have requested that these be opened to the Imperial Majesty most humbly. Majesty most humbly, that we also therefore with Diligence to do. And the reported embassies have offered against it to reach this act and farewell to the said our uncle with best diligence, the undoubted confidence that his love would let herself be heard on it of her mind, too.

In witness whereof we two Electors, above mentioned, have affixed our seals to this letter.

And by the grace of God, we Johann Friederich, instead of and on account of our lord and father, the Elector of Saxony, and ourselves, also on account of our uncle Duke Philipp of Brunswick, Franciscus, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg.

And we have messages named after, namely on account of Mr. Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg, Wolf Christoph von Weißenthau?) Amtmann at Schwabach, and Sebastian Heller, Doctor.

By reason of Mr. Ernten, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Johann von der Wick, Doctor.

On account of Prince Wolfen of Anhalt, Count Gebhardt and Count Albrecht of Mansfeld, Johann Rüel, Doctor.

On behalf of the city of Strasbourg, Jakob Sturm, old city master, and Johann 2) Meyer.

By order of the city of Nuremberg, Bernhard Baumgärtner and Leonhard Schultheiß, and by order of the cities of Hall in Swabia, Heilbronn, Winsheim, and Weißenburg am Nordgau. 3)

By order of Lübeck, Andreas Stolp, Secretarius, by order of those of Hamburg.

Constance, Conrad Zwick and Sebastian Geißberg.

By order of the city of Ulm, Georg Besserer, old mayor, and Hieronymus Schleicher, and the same with order of the city of Ißni.

Of the old city of Magdeburg, Leonhard Merz, Doctor and Syndicus.

By reason of the city of Bremen, Johann von der Wick, Doctor, above-named.

By order of the city of Brunswick, Dietrich Preuß, secretary, with order of the von Goßlar, Göttingen and Eimbeck.

By reason of the city of Kempten, Heinrich Seltenhan:

We therefore agree and undertake for ourselves, our sovereigns and superiors, to comply with it and to live by it, and not to do anything contrary to it, in any way.

And in witness whereof we, Duke John Frederick, of our fathers and of ourselves, and of the cities and embassies aforesaid, have affixed our seal unto this letter, which is given at Nuremberg, Tuesday after St. Mary Magdalene [23 July], after. Birth of Christ 1532 year.

1203 D. Martin Luther's advice and concerns to Elector John of Saxony concerning the peace treaty at Nuremberg. Beginning of May 1532.

The original of this thought is found in the Weimar Archives, USZ. H. fol. 64. 14. It was delivered Thursday after Exaudi (May 16) (Burkhardt, p. 205). Printed in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 308; in the Altenburger, vol. V, p. 1021; in the Leipziger, vol. XX, p. 373; in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 369, according to the original, but dated: "In April," and likewise in the Erlanger, vol. 54, p. 301.

(1) In the proposals of the Electors, I find little to dispute, for almost all the articles have been put in an amicable and mild way. But since our part has improved several articles, I see nothing to be highly disputed where such a change could not be obtained from the opposite part.

(2) And at first, concerning the appendix in the first article, namely, "and others who would join the confession," it is to be observed that this appendix is not to be preserved with the opposite, for if in this peace all who might still want to accept our doctrine were also drawn in, there is no doubt that all their people would soon be turned back.

003 Wherefore it is my counsel that this appendix be not thus disputed, that thereby the whole

If you do not want to go this way, let the peace deal be overturned. For though others may be provoked and moved to accept this doctrine, yet every man is bound to accept and confess the gospel in his own way.

004 And ours have done enough, that they neither forbid nor hinder, nor even offer the gospel to any man, and are not bound to set themselves in such a way as this, by which others are not helped: for what would it profit other cities, that ours should be overrun and afflicted? neither would others be helped thereby.

(5) The princes and cities of this part have hitherto accepted this doctrine with their own accord, and have not been induced to do so by the entreaty of anyone else for protection or help, nor have they sought to make a pact against the emperor or anyone else. So may other cities and countries do from now on, which nevertheless have less trouble through this peace, because if the things remained so unsettled.

006 Neither is it sufficient that we should not withhold the gospel from others, as is plain from these propositions; neither is it proper for us to compel the emperor, or any other potentate, that they should secure theirs to our liking. For that the emperor secures us is by grace, and is personal xrvilezium.

007 That now the emperor may show this grace to others also, we cannot and shall not compel him to do so; but others may dare to do it by the grace of God, and hope that they may also obtain peace and safety, as we also must still hope.

8 Item: In this peace, however, other cities and private persons are granted that the gospel may be communicated to them. Where the authorities permit, we may send preachers there; but where the authorities do not permit, private individuals nevertheless have this advantage, that they are safe in life and limb, but may sell and go away. Item, if 8P66l68 were generally admitted, the Potestat will have little cause against the laity, and by this admission of the ceremonies our doctrine will also be accepted and spread further, and their masses will come more into apostasy.

the others by this peace great advantage, and not hindrance to the gospel.

009 Nevertheless, it is fair to consider what it would be considered for if we were to dispute this appendix very much; for it may be considered as if we were working to make other potentates fall away from theirs, and were clinging to us, 2c. thereby to bring the whole empire from the emperor to us.

010 And in sum, we cannot justly compel the emperor to secure our pleasure to his own, who are no kinsmen of ours.

(11) Therefore, I ask that we do not quarrel with this appendix, so that the peaceful action may not be completely overturned.

(12) Although in the following articles some changes in the proposals submitted by our part are well and Christianly considered, I find nothing that is particularly hard to dispute. And especially I ask, what concerns temporal things, as the monastery estates and the like, that one does not let the peace be shattered because of that. For E. F. G. knows that no temporal thing on earth should be held in higher or better esteem than peace.

(13) I find from the transactions that both Electors, Mainz and Palatinate, have indeed done enough, and more than I would have hoped, that it is now due to us to thank our Lord God, who greets us so graciously, faithfully, and to take care that we do not stand in the light for ourselves, and deny such peace. For the elective business, in my opinion, should not be so important that such a gracious peace should be rejected.

014 And if it shall come to pass (God being in favor), I will be excused for my person, as I have before and hitherto faithfully presented my poor opinion, if it shall come to war for the sake of these things; for I cannot understand how all Germany should be thrown together for the sake of such things, if it can be avoided by the remission of a small article of the golden bull.

015 For though King Ferdinand, contrary to the contents of the bull of gold, 2c. is mentioned, yet such sin is not a sin against the Holy Ghost, and we ourselves are more so and greater sin upon us, and may our Lord God (where we would pride ourselves) in time reveal to us the beam in our eyes too plainly and indeed, and hide that mote altogether.

(16) Moreover, if it should come to strife and war (since God is for it), it is certain that ten times, even innumerable times more injustice and misfortune would follow from it for all countries than can now follow if King Ferdinand remains king. And who wants to burden himself with so much blood for the sake of such a thing, because it can be avoided without a great risk?

(17) Therefore, my heartfelt advice would be to look upon this time as an opportunity, and no longer respect a small sin or wrong, rather than all of Germany's great and dreadful fate, which might follow from such hardness. For it is the true experience and truth, Lunimuni fiis, summn inMrin, Sharp right is the highest wrong; but forgiveness of sins is the best right, as we ourselves would have forgiven us.

(18) So my gracious lord himself can well imagine what danger might arise for their own persons from this, especially because one can well see in the dealings with what faithfulness and seriousness S. F. G. means the people who drive so hard on it; for I well notice in the lords of Bavaria that they would like to make a soup that someone else should eat out, and they would like to stand by and push the driving away from them. D. Martin Luther.

1204. D. Martin Luther's Concerns of Spiritual Goods. Perhaps in April 1532.

The original of this letter is in the Weimar Archives, X, 462, 220.1. Printed in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 313; in the Aktenburger, vol. V, p. 1027; in the Leipziger, vol. XX, p. 379; in De Wette, vol. I V, p. 365; and in the Erlanger, vol. 54, p. 297.

001 This matter is in two parts: the first is of the worship of the clergy, and the other of the goods of the clergy.

2nd From the first, if one asks: whether the Elector of Saxony 2c. has been or still is obliged to rebuild the monasteries or convents.

That the monks and priests kept their former manner in worship, whereupon they have endowed and temporal goods therefore?

Answer 3: Because the Elector of Saxony has reported this in his conscience and is certain that such priesthood and monasticism is an annoying sham against the faith, even a public blasphemy against God and his word, he can by no means reestablish such blasphemy, nor help, advise, or protect it, but is rather obligated to help and advise as much as is possible so that it may be stopped and cease. For St. Paul also condemns to death those in Romans 2 who do not resist the loose nature, but let it go as if they had a desire to do so. So also the ecclesiastical law stands in many places, and commands that abuses should be stopped without delay. And if the Elector were to help in this, or to use counsel or protection, so that the abuses were restored, he would not only be partially responsible, but would be the guilty party and the source of all the abominations and blasphemies that arose from this. And, in sum, this piece has no doubt but to be founded in Scripture, all rights, reason, and conscience.

004 Of the other, if it be asked, whether the Elector shall take possession of the estates where abuses have fallen, and are not to be restored? 2c.

(5) Answer: Because there is no one in the principality and lands who can or might take possession of such property, it is not only reasonable, but also a great necessity, that the sovereign should take it for himself, so that it may be prevented from being stolen, robbed, taken away, or otherwise perishing. Just as he is obligated to take all other uninherited or abandoned estates (where there are no heirs) in the principality, as the laws teach.

006 But if one should pretend to leave such goods to other monks of the same order, and lead them out of the country, or let other monks put them there, it is said above that one should not let other monks put them there, for that would be as much as helping to establish the abuses again. Even if such monks came in, who did not have to practice their abuses, they would spoil, sell and kill the goods.

And they shall go away at last, and so leave the goods desolate behind them; which all would be vain thievery and robbery, and the sovereign is due to forestall it. As all other princes and authorities do now, that they let all goods be inventoried 2c., and is right.

007 Yea, say they, the goods are nevertheless the order's own, therefore let them follow the order? This is not true; For the goods are endowed, and not so freely appropriated to the order, that they may carry them away, and bring them to another place, but are endowed to a named place, and to remain there, of the opinion that in the same place, and not elsewhere, such goods may be used for divine service, And whoever carries or brings them elsewhere is a thief and robber, as he who takes the goods of the founders from this place, and carries them there, where the founders did not intend, and he also has no right to take again from there, nor to carry there.

What is the use of such goods? Here one cannot answer better, than that one has to pay attention to the will and opinion of the founders, which has never been different, than that they want to give such goods for God's service and honor. Whether or not they were not right, it is to be judged according to their will and opinion that they are still needed for the service and honor of God, as there are pastors, preachers, schools, and what more belongs to God's word and sacrament and pastoral care. And although divine service takes place in all good offices and ministries, which should also be promoted, the above-mentioned offices, namely pastoral care and preaching, schools, are the highest, most necessary, and most distinguished, which the old princes especially meant with their monasteries and convents, and which were initially also kept that way.

(9) But whether the sovereign may keep some of such goods for himself, or give them to others? To speak without hypocrisy, also without deterrence, if the sovereign had spent the greatest part on pastoral care and schools, and then needed the rest for secular government (which is also divine service, although the lesser of the two), I consider it to be without risk. The same

For such monasteries and convents were founded for the needs of such people in old age, and have been used and enjoyed in convents and monasteries (although under spiritual names) until now, that basically not much has been different with convents and monasteries than with rich hospitals for poor children of great people 2c. But that here the measures should be kept, that the stingy and rich should not have their bellies satisfied with it, and that most of all attention should be paid to the offence, so that the gospel should not be slandered and blasphemed, as from a just cause.

10. If this is prevented, I do not want to be conscience-stricken, because all the trouble and expense that the clergy have been obliged to do up to now, and that is why they have also received the goods, falls on the Elector, namely, that he carries out the visitation, He must carry all the journeys and costs of the married priests and monks, and of the whole gospel, which costs a great deal to carry, protect, and handle, and has great care and trouble, and the bishops and princes of none do 2c. Is it then no offense that popes, bishops, and monks have had such goods, and still have them, as thieves and robbers, because they do nothing for them in the cause of the gospel and the service of God, and now kings and princes rob and take such goods? And if kings and princes steal and take such goods, and in addition great gifts, and pursue the service of God, we should much less reckon it a grievance to the prince, if he keeps some spiritual goods for himself, because he must bear so many costs and labors for the sake of the gospel and the poor priests and monks. He is not obliged to do this in vain and out of his own, as Christ says [Matt. 10:10], "A laborer is worth his wages." St. Ambrose sold chalices and church utensils to ransom the prisoners. I also respect such work on the part of the prince that he helps, protects, and gives space to the gospel and its followers in a fine principality with his own driving; for which help, protection, driving, and other efforts and costs Christ will gladly give him a monastery, if he must nevertheless let all the world's monasteries, foundations, and kingdoms take away his persecutors.

(11) This is what I want to say, so that one does not tighten the conscience of the Elector too much with the use of the ecclesiastical goods, and with silence of the trouble, costs, travel and misfortune which he must bear for it or besides, but also does not make it too free and wide to give cause and space to unnecessary annoyance and the blasphemers, with all too mild and safe distribution of the said goods.

1205. D. Martin Luther's concerns about sequestration. Perhaps in October 1) 1532.

The original of this thought can be found in the Weimar Archives, RvZ. X, PNA. 452.220.1. Printed in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 313; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 1027; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 379; by De Wette, vol. IV, p. 409 (after the original), and in the Erlangen double, viz. vol. 54, 334 and vol. 65, p. 54.

1. of the sequestration to M. G. Herr seliger 2c. O. Martinus has raised his objections, letting it remain for himself; what others improve he lets go well, and were almost and approximately these pieces: 2)

(2) First of all, that it should be seen above all that parishes, ecclesiastics, schools, hospitals, common castes, and poor students are fairly provided for out of the spiritual goods.

(3) I would not object to his C.F.G. using what is left over for himself to reimburse the inordinate expenses that C.F.G. has incurred for the gospel and the church. For S. C. F. G. is not obligated, because church goods are there, to do such from his own and his own, and one is obligated to reimburse him for it by law.

(4) That also S. C. F. G. gives something to some poor of the nobility, or also otherwise highly deserving, or to the common building, bridges, ways, footbridges, land fortresses, but with a measure, seems to me not to be so wrong as the nasty canonists are faking; considered.

1) De Wette bases this time determination on the fact that Luther writes to Hausmann on Nov. 6th: the sequestration proceeds strictly.

2) Like the postscript, this entry must also be attributed to Jonah. The reservation itself is said to be in Luther's handwriting.

as pope, bishop and parish priest in the papacy have done much and great "help of church goods" to their friendship, and, as I consider, have often done it (where it was necessary) without sin.

(5) Hereby you may show and do how our most gracious Lord has hitherto maintained D. Martin and Philip 2c. and let them serve the whole Christian church with writing, reading, preaching, printing, 1) and have never received a farthing from any church, but have lain on the neck of the prince, who with his own has thus had to serve all the world; that, if one wants to reckon sharply, one should make the register so large for the splinter judges that they should hardly pay the prince with their sequestration. Therefore, you should diligently show the splinter judges their beams, as they themselves do not give a farthing to the Gospel, nor lend a good word to it, and only want to condemn or sanctify princes and all the world with their spiritless Bachantian rights.

(6) If they would bring all church goods into order, why do they not raise them up, become beam judges, and reform the devil in the papacy? since all the goods are not only stolen from the church, but are also persecuted with them and God is blasphemed. Fie on you hostile splinter judges!

7th Item, to be remembered by D. Christians, chancellor, that inan wanted to stop in the sequestration, so that all monks in all monasteries, both dead and alive, both expired and remained, would be kept so that they would give back to spiritual goods what they have eaten away and consumed so far as the rotten bellies and blasphemers of the church of their goods.

Item 8: That Duke George, Ferdinand, Bavaria, and 2c. also restore what they enjoyed and used, and still enjoy, of such goods.

Postscript by Doctor Jonas.

That D. Martinus Luther, our dear father, has written this down to me in haste, and especially ordered it to be reported to you, has given cause for his having heard and been told by D. Christian's chancellor himself 2c.

1) In the original: "Diener gewest", but crossed out again; "dienen lassen" in the Eisleben edition.

He has heard how he insists on keeping the Canons very strictly in this case, so that at last the conscience should be weighed down and grieved, although in the sight of God or according to the laws of the world this is not everywhere so sinful and highly grievous, but there are also other defects and sins which are not so highly exaggerated nor weighed down by canonists; although D. Martin's and all of us are quite pleased with the sequestration.

1206. farewell of the Diet of Regensburg erected Anno 1532.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, put. Aon. eont. I., p. 591, but not completely, but only as far as it concerns religion.

We Carl the Fifth, by the Grace of GOD, elected Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire, King in Germania, in Castile, in Arragon, in Legion, in both Sicilies, in Jerusalem, in Hungary, in Dalmatia, in Croatia, Navarre, in Granatia, to Tolleten, to Valence, to Galicia, Nujoi-earura, Hispalw, Karckirüas, Oorckudus, Oorsieus, Nureius, OisQuis, 1Zurdish, 1Z6öiras, to Gibraltaris, and the Jnsulen Canariä, also the Jnsulen Iveiarura, and Psrras ürmes of the Sea Oceani 2c.; Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, of Lotterich, of Brabant, of Steyer, of Carinthia and Carniola, Limburg, Guelders, Württemberg, Calabria, Neo-putriae; Count of Habsburg, of Flanders, of Tyrol, of Gorizia, of Parsiloni, of Ärthoys, of Burgundy; Count Palatine of Hanigau, of Holland, of Zealand, of Psiert, of Kyburg, of Namur, of Rosilion, of Ceritan, and of Zütphen; Landgrave in Alsace, Margrave of Burggau, of Oristani, of Gotiani; and of the Holy Roman Empire Prince of Swabia, of Catalonia, Asturia 2c. Lord of Friesland, of the Wendish Mark, of Portenau, of Biscay, of Molen, of Salins, of Tripoli, and of Mechelen, declare and proclaim manfully: Since our mind, opinion, and desire have always been above all others, and still are, that we gladly do all that is due to us, our Imperial Highness and Office. We are still inclined to do everything that is due to us, our imperial highness and office, and to do everything of our best and highest fortune that may serve and be fruitful for the welfare, good order, leadership and providence of the Holy Roman Empire, the praiseworthy German nation. For this reason, in these difficult times and times, we, out of unavoidable necessity, public and movable causes, which we, the Holy Roman Empire and the German Nation, highly and noticeably desire, and also our Imperial and Gracious Holy Roman Emperor, have the right to do.

We have undertaken to hold a common Diet in Speier, the city of ours and of the Holy Empire, on the fourteenth day of the next month of September, in order to put an end to the confusion and discord of our holy Christian faith, to resist the cruel intentions of the Turks, and to preserve the peace, justice, good police and welfare of the same German nation, and to attend it in person in every way.

1. Since, however, between our announcement and the proclamation of the same Diet, so many great burdensome things have come to light, not only for us and our hereditary kingdoms and lands, but also for the whole of Christendom, the Holy Empire of the German Nation, for the common peace, welfare, and so on, and the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, for the sake of public peace and welfare, and that especially manifold reports and newspapers are coming in, how the hereditary enemy of our faith and name, the Turk, is in noticeably great armament and readiness, and should finally be of the opinion that Christendom, and especially the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, will this summer once again be attacked. For these and other excellent and important reasons, we have been moved to change the above-mentioned Diet of Speier, and to move it to this city of ours and of the Empire, Regensburg, and to schedule it for the nearest possible day of the Three Kings. In order to keep such a Diet beneficial, we have promoted our affairs in the Netherlands so much more, and have set aside great concerns for our hereditary kingdoms and lands, and, at no small expense and inconvenience, have also disposed of ourselves here in person, as soon as possible; In our Christian imperial mind, will and opinion, to put an end to the discord in our holy Christian faith, which has become more and more burdensome, with timely advice, and otherwise to make, establish, resolve and maintain all good unity and peace in the holy realm, in this and other matters, all of which is far from the content of our invitation to this Imperial Diet.

(2) At which Diet we, as well as princes, princes, and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, appeared before us in good number, in our own persons, and some by their embassy, with full power.

003 Though now in Christian union the discord in our holy Christian faith and the same article, as not being of the least difficulty, should have been taken in hand, discussed and brought to a unanimous Christian understanding and good end, and yet we respect and fear that the Turk, out of such discord, will undoubtedly, by the doom of the Almighty, to punish our sins, take all the more heart to conquer the Christian kingdom of Hungary, which is the closest border to the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, by the doom of the Almighty, for the punishment of our sins, the more he will take heart to conquer the Christian kingdom of Hungary, which borders most closely on the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, so that he can continue to cruelly inflict Christian blood on the German nation with murder, fire and tyranny, as happened in the year 1529. He would like to rage cruelly and bring it under his tyrannical power.

4th And if we, also our brother, the Roman king Ferdinand 2c., have had more and more news and certain information from various places, how the reported hereditary enemy of our holy Christian name and faith, the Turk, with more and greater force and power than never before, is in constant, diligent armament and the final intention is to invade the above-mentioned Christendom, and has already sent a number of soldiers and ships with all kinds of ammunition up the Danube in large numbers.

5. The envoys of our Archduchy of Austria, as well as of other of our principalities and lands, namely Austria below and above the river Ens, also Styria, Carinthia and Carniola, have informed us, also princes, princes and the common estates of the realm, at this Imperial Diet here, the high and burdensome, careful and dangerous hardship, compulsion and pressure of the Turk, in which our lands and subjects stand, and that the Turk is approaching them with all his might, are humbly appropriate and acknowledged; Which we then in pity of our imperial mind graciously heard. Thereupon the same envoys have humbly appealed to us, as well as to the princes, princes, and estates, and have asked that we, in consideration of their highest, greatest, and most dangerous distress, come to their aid, rescue, and protection, and graciously deign to relieve them of such distress.

(6) Therefore, at our gracious request and as a courtesy to us, for the above-mentioned reasons, and because the Holy Roman Empire and common Christendom have no more hateful or bloodthirsty enemy than the Turks, the unavoidable necessity of the article of urgent help against the Turks has been taken in hand for the first time.

with the utmost diligence, weighed up and discussed

7. And in order that such a burdensome, pernicious, unforeseen invasion and invasion of the Turk may be averted and prevented from Christendom, the Holy Roman Empire and the German Nation, Princes, Princes and Estates have, not only for their own good, but also and first of all in honor of God Almighty, and for the handling of our Christian name and faith, and also to avert such tyrannical behaviour of the Turk, have now met here, united and promised us to bring the urgent help, granted at the recently held Imperial Diet in Augsburg, to the time and place reported in our outgoing exhortations and mandates, for the protection of our holy Christian faith, to the work conductive and without delay, to use it against the Turk, as reported; all the contents of the Augsburg Deed, which the common estates at this Imperial Diet have taken in hand, renewed, and again resolved upon, as follows: namely, that such urgent aid to the Turks shall be rendered by all estates together and especially in men, and not in money; with this addition: whoever does not intend to render his aid in men, but in other ways, such as these, by which the number of the imperial warriors may be reduced, that he or they shall not live up to this agreement, and that for the sake of the street, as stipulated in the Augsburg agreement, they shall be proceeded against by the treasurer, against whom no liberty or order shall be presented to him or them. However, no estate shall be forbidden to appoint its people to the other, in such a way that the appointed people are nevertheless mustered and reported at the common muster ground, and [by] each district's captain 1) so that it may be known that there is no decrease in the number.

8. And since the great and unavoidable need requires that, for the entertainment of the above-mentioned people of war, good provision be made by half, so that there is no lack thereof, it is considered good that the provisions be ordered, ordered and supplied by the Provisions Masters in a beneficial manner, but that the excessive and disorderly pre-purchase in such occur and be avoided, but that a free market be kept, as is the custom of war and custom, that also such provisions be left duty and toll free in all cities, customs and places, all the contents of the article in the Augsburg Treaty be enacted.

1) "Kreises Hauptmann" put by us instead of: "Creishauptmann".

... And that such a thing be used by those who have customs and tolls, in other ways harmless, also no other danger, under the appearance of this good work, with due punishment. For this purpose, every authority in its territories shall have the understanding that the provisions shall be contributed to this Christian work by the request of the provisionmaster for a considerable penny.

Concilium.

Furthermore, we, also princes, princes and estates, have taken the article concerning the discord of our holy Christian faith as the highest and most noble, in which the salvation of common Christendom and the German nation is best served, before our hands, and have discussed it most faithfully. And if we, also princes, rulers and estates, consider and judge what has happened in the faith and otherwise much evil, from the beginning of the discord until now, we find at first that in the faith many a discord, sect and error, the like of which has never been heard in many hundred years, has arisen, which from day to day have so increased and prevailed, where they do not occur in time, that still more and further apostasy of the faith and of the Christian religion is to be feared; besides which it follows that all discipline, honor and obedience, and other good virtue, in the spiritual and in the secular, will entirely fall away, as hitherto manly knowing and unconcealed.

2. And although in our absence at previous imperial congresses, namely Nuremberg, Speier, and also most recently in our personal presence at Augsburg, we have been advised of this in all necessity, and nothing has been more fruitfully considered or regarded as a means of calming this serious conflict, than that a common Christian council be held and announced by papal sanctity, so that this division of our holy Christian faith may again be brought to good unity and uniform understanding. The Princes, Princes and Estates of Augsburg have most humbly requested and asked us to promote and decree so much with Papal Holiness that a common Christian council be announced by their Holiness within six months after the end of the same Augsburg Imperial Diet at the appropriate venue, and that it be started and held in the most beneficial way and at the earliest within a year after such announcement; which we also, at your most humble request and entreaty, thus accepted and granted. And for this reason, the effort, work, and diligence that we have undertaken with the Estates at the above-mentioned Imperial Diet at Augsburg for the sake of religion, so that the aforementioned Estates' request may be satisfied, a public person has been sent to Papal Holiness and the College of Cardinals with letters and orders to ask, request and request that the reported General Council be announced and held. At our request Papal Holiness and the College of Cardinals have sent the Bishop of Tortona, Gubernator of Bologna, to us, together with the Papal Legate Comepejo and Bishop of Vason, at the same time Uuruño Apostolico, to dispose of us. They have also come to us in the city of Liège, and have indicated to us that papal holiness and the cardinals are willing to indicate and hold the concilium. But beforehand they reported and indicated to us the points and complaints, on what form and manner, for what causes, at what time and place such a council should be called, so that it should really be held, as is proper. On which points we have deemed it necessary to speak and act with the King of France. And have therefore sent a considerable embassy to the same king of France, which has had all kinds of speeches with him. And the same king has understood the inevitable need of the Concilii. But in the end the matter remained unresolved, as far as the form and manner of convening the reported council was concerned, especially with regard to the place. And as we now see and note that the appointment of the Council is based on these doubts and difficulties, we then considered it good to report this to the Estates at the appointed Imperial Diet at Speier. And when the situation arose that we would come to papal sanctity after the completion of the same Diet, we then wanted to pursue such a council with the advice of the common estates. However, due to the hindrances that have occurred, as only men know, this has not yet taken place, and has therefore caused us to call and hold this Imperial Diet, at which we Princes, Princes and Estates have further announced all this.

3rd Thereupon we, also princes, princes and estates, further investigated the matters, and because we found that this burden of the discord of faith, from one imperial diet to the next, the longer the more prevalent, and has now grown to where the Christian religion and faith in the realm of the German nation, likewise peace and unity are preserved, and destruction of the whole German nation will occur.

that this may be done by no nearer, more constant, more certain, and middle way, than by a common general council.

(4) Accordingly, Princes, Princes, and Estates, and the message of the absentee, have once again most humbly and diligently requested and asked us, in consideration of the great need and danger in which the German nation stands, to once again promote such a council in the most beneficial manner with Papal Holiness.

(5) And if we should not obtain from papal sanctity that the said council should be described and held in the German lands, that we should then ex officio make provision for it, which is due to us by our imperial power and which we are obliged to do, and especially in the matter of the said council, which is of such great necessity. And if such a thing should ever not be obtained, from what hindrance it may happen now or in the future, that we may then convene an assembly in the Holy Empire, thereby helping the great concerns that exist and increase daily in the German nation, and counteracting the unavoidable harm that might otherwise irreparably result from it:

(6) We have considered the above-mentioned estates' diligent petition, made to us for this reason, the above-mentioned estates' timely good consideration and counsel, also the great necessity of these matters and what is involved, and the nature and diligence in which the German nation stands because of the discord and repugnance which arises on account of our holy faith. Therefore we, as Roman Christian Emperors, out of special love and desire, so that we bear peace and good unity to the common German nation and the same estates, and especially in consideration of the hindrance in which we now stand, together with the estates of the German nation, for the protection of the same and our holy faith and the common benefit of Christendom, against our common and all Christian enemy, have compared ourselves with the same estates, and they in turn with us, with one another: That we, in accordance with the eager diligence which we had for the sake of the aforementioned Council, as it was decided at Augsburg, and also, as the estates sufficiently understood, have applied, wish to promote papal holiness, and to do everything eagerly and with good diligence which is in our power, so that the same Council may be held in a convenient place. And that Papal Holiness, the See of Rome, indicate and proclaim the same, and in six months' time, the next day of the month, to hold the same concilium.

It is to be announced and then held within a year, and that papal holiness will do so. And if it should be the case that, beyond our possible diligence, we should not be able to call and hold the aforementioned General Council in the way and measure described above, for whatever reason, way or hindrance this should occur, be it by whom it will (although we hope that Papal Holiness will do what is due to it, and that for this reason there will be no lack of it), we will in that case call and hold a General Imperial Council, and give the common estates to understand and indicate the reasons why such a general council is thus prevented, so that then, according to the opportunity of the time and the circumstances, and how the circumstances of Christendom then turn out, it may be considered and discussed how such things may be provided for the benefit of our holy faith, whether by calling a general council, or otherwise by other means and acceptable ways, as are most convenient and considered necessary. And especially for the common necessity of the German nation, so that it may come into good uniform unity, rule, and understanding of our holy faith, for some consolation to God and the Mother, our Christian Church, and so that good peace and tranquility may be kept everywhere in the Empire. And in this we want to do what is due and due to a benevolent Emperor, who is inclined to do good to the German nation, and not let anything happen to us, confident that the estates will also do the same 2c.

1207 Roman Imperial Majesty's Approval and Assurance of the First Religious Peace established at Nuremberg in 1532. Given at Regensburg, August 2, 1532.

This writing is found in Hortleder, "von den Ursachen des deutschen Kriegs," tom. I, lib. I, oup. 11, p. 70 and in Lünig's Reichs-Archiv, pari. Mn. oont. I., p. 604. In Walch's old edition it is printed again in No. 1252 of the 17th volume.

We Carl, by the Grace of God Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire 2c., publicly confess and announce with this letter: As we have declared to the most reverend in God Father and Highborn Albrechten, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg; and Ludwig, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria 2c., our dear friends, grandparents and Electors, between ourselves and the Elector of Saxony, and his L. L. son, Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., and their related counts and cities, to act amicably in the disputed religious matter, graciously consented, by virtue of our authority, instruction and order, to their lords and ladies. and thus manifold amicable negotiations were held initially at Schweinfurt and subsequently at Nuremberg, and the matter finally came to this, that we, as the supreme head in the Holy Roman Empire, graciously consented to our friends, sovereigns and princes, Mainz and Palatinate, to establish a common and lasting peace between us and all the estates of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, ecclesiastical and secular, until a common, free, Christian concilium, as such was decided at the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg, or if this would not have its continuation until the common estates of the empire would be called and described again in an appropriate forum, as will be understood in a special article hereafter.

That in the meantime, or until the estates, as now reported, come to each other again, and are otherwise consulted, no one shall feud, war, 1) rob, see, overrun, besiege, or even serve the other by himself or someone else on his behalf, nor descend some castles, cities, markets, fortifications, villages, farms, or hamlets, or, without the will of the other, take them by force, or dangerously damage them with fire or in other ways, nor give them advice, help, or any other kind of assistance or support, nor knowingly and dangerously harbor, house, etch, water, contain, or tolerate them, but each one should treat the other with true friendship and Christian love. Which now reported common peace we, the Imperial Majesty, have signed. Maj, declare and proclaim to all the estates of the Holy Empire, and command them to keep the same, heavy, considerable penalty, and also to use gracious diligence, that the above-mentioned council be declared and published in half a year, and thereafter be held in one year, and in case this should not be achieved, that then the common estates of the realm be summoned to each other again at a convenient place and described to deliberate what is to be done and acted upon for the sake of the aforementioned council and other necessary matters.

1) "bekriegen" put by us instead of: "betriegen" after No. 1208, s 3.

That we therefore graciously grant and promise, for the sake of the continued and permanent preservation of the aforementioned common peace, to institute all justification in matters concerning the faith, which have been or may yet be initiated by our Fiscal and others against the Elector of Saxony and his allies, until the next Concilium, or, if the Concilium is not held, if the estates of the aforementioned are seen to have other ways of doing so. And if Saxony and its neighbors, in general and in particular, should be justly attacked and complained of by anyone, then he or they, having thus justly made, shall abolish and establish such justification made by us, if we were in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, or in our absence by our governor or commanders, who shall have the expressed command thereof from us, in and by virtue of this letter; And if any judge or court shall proceed, act, and adjudge thereon, all and every such thing shall be void, of no effect, and of no dignity, and shall not bind nor obligate the person or persons so proceeded against and adjudged, in any way but peril. In witness 2c.

1208 Roman Imperial Majesty's Mandate, concerning the Nuremberg Religious Peace, or peaceful decency of faith and religion, of the Holy Empire of the German Nation. Issued at Regensburg, August 3, 1532.

See No. 1207.

1. we Carl the Fifth 2c. hereby convey to all and any electors, princes, ecclesiastical and secular, prelates, counts, barons, knights, servants, captains, bailiffs, governors, stewards, administrators, bailiffs, mayors, judges, councillors, citizens, and otherwise all other subjects and faithful of ours and of the realm, in whatever dignity, station or being they may be, and otherwise to all other subjects and faithful of ours and of the realm, in whatever dignity, station or being they may be, to whom this imperial letter or a copy thereof may be seen and read, or shown, our friendship, grace and all good things. High and venerable, highborn, dear friends, nephews, grandfathers, electors and princes, also well-born, honorable, noble, dear, devout and faithful. Since in the Holy Empire of the German Nation there are noticeably great confusions, discord and

The Turkish, the hereditary enemy of our holy Christian faith and name, the Turk, has come to Hungary in his own person, with great power, and is willing to attack Austria and other countries of the Holy Roman Empire, especially at this time, when the hereditary enemy of our holy Christian faith and name, the Turk, in his own person, with a great power, has come to Hungary, and is willing to move further on Austria and other German lands, and to bring them under his cruel obedience and power, as for the extermination of our holy Christian faith.

(2) Therefore, for the above-mentioned and other excellent reasons, as the great necessity requires, we are inclined to keep the common German nation in good peace and unity, so that it may be prevented from corruption, damage, and harm.

(3) Accordingly, we, as the supreme head, have decreed between all the estates of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, ecclesiastical and secular, in the whole of Christendom, until a common, free, Christian conciliation, as decided at the Diet of Nuremberg, or, if this does not proceed, until the common estates of the Empire, as follows, are called together again in a convenient place and described, to establish a common peace, and to have it publicized everywhere in the Empire. As we then know from Roman imperial power and right knowledge. As we hereby, out of Roman imperial authority and right knowledge, establish and publicize such a common peace, in such a way that between the aforementioned council, or that the estates, as mentioned above, come back to each other, and through an imperial council, in the matter of religion, other agreements are made, so that no one can confront the other on the grounds of faith and religion, nor for any other reason, Neither may any person, by himself or by any other person for his own sake, war against, rob, see, invade, besiege, nor take any castle, city, market, fortification, village, farm, or hamlet, or without the will of the other, take it by force, or dangerously damage it by fire or in any other way. Nor shall anyone give such offenders advice, help, or in any other way assist or abet them, nor knowingly or dangerously harbor, house, cauterize or water, contain or tolerate them,

1) "Market" put by us instead of: "Mark", according to No. 1202, 8 5 and No. 1207.

...but each to the other with true friendship...

...and love. lcher love is supposed to mean.

(4) We also request that every effort be made and encouraged so that the above-mentioned council may be advertised and publicized within six months and then held within a year, but in the event that this is not achieved, that the common estates of the realm may then be called together again at an appropriate venue and described to deliberate on what should be done and acted upon for the sake of the above-mentioned council and other necessary matters.

005 And thereupon we earnestly enjoin all of you, and each of you in particular, by the duties and oaths, so that you may be bound to us and to the holy realm, also the penalties, punishments, and fines in our land peace, established at Worms, with this letter.

6. And we will and command on behalf of the Holy Roman Empire that you firmly keep this common peace in all its points and articles, as it is expressed from word to word, and that no one should neither deceive nor harm the other, whether of spiritual or temporal rank, but let each keep the other completely, neither offending nor harming him in any way, so that each may avoid our and the kingdom's severe disgrace and punishment, as well as the penalty of the aforementioned peace of the land, into which each one, as often as he commits an unlawful act against it, shall fall by the deed. This we sincerely mean by the deed of this letter. Given in our and the Empire's city of Regensburg, the 3rd day of the month of August, Anno Domini 1532.

1. we, by the grace of God, Albrecht, of the holy Roman church of the title 8. uck vivoulu priest Cardinal, lvSMTus rmtus, Archbishop of Magdeburg and Mainz, Primate, Archchancellor and Elector 2c., and by the same Grace, we George, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia, Margrave in Meissen, confess and declare in this open letter: After, and as between the Most Sublime, Most Great, Highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Ferdinand, Roman King 2c., on one, and the Highborn Prince and Lord, Lord John Frederick, Duke of Saxony 2c., Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, our friendly dear lord, uncle, brother and cousin, together with their kinsmen, on the other hand, have for some time been in some discord and affliction on account of their Roman Royal Majesty's election to the Roman throne. Maj.'s election as Roman King, about which the said Elector of Saxony, together with his kinsmen, has protested for some of the aforementioned reasons; also about some disputation and confusion, which, for the sake of peace, has recently taken place at Nuremberg in the matter of religion, and which has been set up by the Roman Royal Maj. Maj., for the sake of several trials held at the Imperial Court of Appeal, that this is to the benefit and honor of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation. Reich of the German Nation to the benefit and honour and welfare, and also to the peace, tranquillity and unity of all the estates of the same, by the gracious permission of the most reverend Royal Majesty. Majesty, also with the permission of our uncle, brothers and cousins, the Elector of Saxony, to act amicably in such afflictions, on account of his and his kinsmen's loyal goodwill.

(2) So then, at the very time when we were engaged in such actions, it happened that the highborn princes, Mr. Ulrich, Duke of Württemberg, 2c., and Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, our beloved grandparents and sons, were subject to invade, capture, and conquer the Duchy of Württemberg, as they had also completely captured and conquered the same with its fortresses, and were also in further undertakings, from which, if such had not occurred, noticeable disquiet might have resulted in the Holy Roman Empire. Reich could have taken place, that we then have to give the royal Maj. Maj. (who, in turn, also stood in valiant warfare to counteract such evil with action, and to regain the same principality that had been wrested from their Majesty) of their owed duty, and requested that their Royal Maj. Maj., in view of the present proceedings and grievances, would graciously permit us, in addition to the aforementioned errors, in the same Württemberg matters to also

The King would like to seek ways and means, by which such intentions would be satisfied, the armament of both parts would be done, and further troubles, which might occur to the Empire and the German Nation, would be prevented. That then her Royal Maj. Maj., as a gracious, kind Roman King, who considers the honor and welfare of the common Realm to be her Maj.'s own benefit, and our cousin, the Elector of Saxony, in place of and by authority of the two Princes now reported, Würtemberg and Hesse, grants and concedes such amicable negotiation, and we undertake the same in the name of God.

(3) And so, for this reason, for several days, first at St. Annenberg, and then at Cadau, in the Kingdom of Bohemia, to which we, for the benefit of the cause, had disposed of ourselves to the Roman Royal Majesty in our own person, we were also able to persuade the Elector of Saxony that his love should finally come there in his own person. Maj. in his own person, and also succeeded in persuading the Elector of Saxony that his love should finally come there in his own person, we have finally, by the grant of the Almighty, and with the consent and approval of all parties, resolved all such disputes, confusion, and infirmities in the following opinion, and finally settled and agreed upon them, as follows, and is reported.

(4) First, that the peace and truce recently established at Nuremberg and, as reported above, commanded by the Roman Royal Majesty to be kept by all estates, be observed in all ways. Majesty to all estates, is to be observed in all ways, and the same is to be lived up to.

(5) And after a misunderstanding occurred therein, the Royal Majesty has graciously granted that her Royal Highness shall be the judge of this matter. Maj. has graciously granted that Her Royal Majesty shall be released from the Maj. on behalf of the Imperial Maj. Maj. shall procure that the proceedings at the Imperial Court of Appeal shall be continued. Chamber Court, for the preservation of this state of peace, against those named therein, and that all proceedings hitherto taken be actually abolished; all according to the terms of the state of peace established therein.

(6) However, the Sacramentarians, Anabaptists, as well as all other new unchristian sects that might be further instigated, are to be excluded from this, and are to be unanimously resisted by the Royal Majesty, Princes, Princes and Estates, and are not to be tolerated or suffered in their lands.

(7) And neither part shall overreach the other in the matter of religion, nor violate, nor deprive the other of his own, with a considerable penalty; namely, if a prince acts contrary thereto, with the loss of his chieftainship, and another princely estate or city, with the loss of its regalia, privileges, and fiefs. And such a breaker of the peace shall in fact be put to the sword.

008 And in all things every part shall be given unto him.

Let them be content with equality and justice against each other, and let no one deprive, deprive, or rape the other without a prior, proper, legal knowledge of what is his; Neither shall those who may presume to be in this peace or not, and shall (in whatever semblance such may be conceived) undertake it by deed, be strengthened with any aid or encouragement, either with men, money, or practice, or how else such deed may be present to this peace; all with the penalty above mentioned.

(9) But that the suspect of the suspicion be overcome beforehand, by virtue of the established truce; all of which the Royal Majesty has graciously granted on behalf of the Imperial Majesty and for himself. Majesty and for himself, and has hereby confirmed that he will neither do nor impose anything contrary to this.

(10) It is also agreed and understood that the Elector of Saxony, together with his kinsmen, shall recognize the Roman king, as other electors and estates do, for a Roman king, as other electors give the title to his majesty, and shall renounce the dispute about the election, and shall and will drop it, as also his love for himself and his kinsmen has at present renounced it, and thereupon has recognized the Roman king.

(11) On the other hand, the Royal Majesty has granted to obtain from the Imperial Majesty, and in part from the Electors, that these following articles be granted. Majesty, and to request from the Princes, who are due to arrive here between Easter and Easter, that these following articles be granted, and thereupon confirmed by the Imperial Majesty in the Golden Bull, and that the same be thereby declared and authenticated.

(12) Namely, that in future, when a Roman emperor or king is to be elected during the life of a Roman emperor or king, all the princes shall first be summoned together to discuss whether there is sufficient cause, and whether it is beneficial to the realm, to elect a Roman king during the life of a Roman emperor or king. And if they agree that then, and not before, the electors shall be required by virtue of the bull of gold to make a royal election, and to proceed to the election, and the same bull of gold shall be followed in all things. And in the event that it is done otherwise, it shall be null and void, and shall be passed by the Emperor's final decree.

(13) And herewith all ill-will and vexation, which all parts have conceived against each other, and which the imperial and royal majesty in disgrace, or otherwise by other estates of the two countries, shall be lifted up. Majesty in disgrace, or otherwise by other estates of the two countries, shall be lifted up. Majesty in disgrace, or otherwise by other estates of the two countries, shall be lifted up.

on the other hand in bad things not be punished, nor be emulated 1). In the event, however, that such aforementioned articles are not approved or resolved upon by the majority of the Electors between now and then, and are permitted, confirmed and confirmed by the Imperial Majesty, then the Elector of Saxony together with his co-assignees shall be entitled to the same. Majesty, then the Elector of Saxony, together with his co-relatives, shall again be free by royal choice or title, and his right shall be reserved to him, and the Royal Majesty shall not be obliged in any way, within or without rights, to remedy this, and nevertheless one part shall be content with equality and right against the other.

014 But because the person to be chosen king of Rome is not of the German language or tongue, whether two or three or more kings of Rome of one house be chosen one after another, therefore the princes shall inwardly compare and unite before a certain time, and this shall be decreed in their union.

(15) In the same way, the Elector of Saxony and his dear minor brothers shall be granted their fiefs and regalia in the time before.

(16) The Royal Majesty also wishes to make the highest and most faithful request to the Imperial Majesty that the treaty of the Elector of Saxony in Jülich and Eleven be signed by her Imperial Majesty. Majesty that the treaty of the Elector of Saxony in Jülich and Eleve be confirmed by their Imperial Majesty. Majesty be confirmed.

(17) But as far as the war and capture of the Principality of Würtemberg is concerned, it is agreed and agreed: after the Royal Majesty has been graciously and kindly enfeoffed with the Principality of Würtemberg by the Imperial Majesty. Maj. with the Principality of Würtemberg, that the Roman Emperor has granted the title of Duke of Würtemberg. 2) that the Roman Royal Majesty retains the title of Duke of Würtemberg, and that for this purpose the Principality of Würtemberg is an after-feud of the House of Austria, and that the Roman Royal Majesty or his heirs, Archdukes of Austria, are bound, after the departure of Duke Ulrich, to confer the principality on his male heirs as a fief, and that the Dukes of Würtemberg, as often as the case may be, are obliged to receive it from the House of Austria as an after-feud. However, the Holy Roman Empire reserves its sovereignty and justice, as well as the status and voice of Würtemberg in the Empire, as it had before, to the declared Duchy in all ways. In the form that the Royal Maj. Maj. for himself and his male descendants, Archdukes of Austria, against the execution of this treaty.

1) Instead of "geeifert" it will probably read "geäfert" as in § 29.

2) Instead of "imperial" should probably read "royal".

as often as the Principality of Würtemberg is granted as an after-feud by Her Royal Majesty or her heirs. Majesty or the same heirs of the feudal estate, the Principality of Würtemberg is granted as a subordinate feud, or the case arises that the Principality of Würtemberg in question falls to the House of Austria and is received in fief from the Reich by the Royal Majesty as Archduke of Austria or the same heirs of the feudal estate. Majesty as Archduke of Austria, or by the same heirs of the feudal estate, would be received and possessed by the realm as a feudal tenure, that by the same feudal tenure the realm is not deprived of anything, but all servitude, obedience, taxation, and other things, as has been customary for ages, are and shall be due to the realm from the feudal tenure indicated.

(18) That Duke Ulrich also recognize, honor, and hold the Royal Majesty as Roman King, and that he, like other estates of the realm, show himself obediently in such, and that he neither shall nor will associate with anyone against the Royal Majesty.

(19) His beloved, together with the landgrave, shall and will also cede again that which in the present conquest of the land has been taken from towns, villages, houses, and other things that do not belong to the land, but are in the charge of other princes, prelates, counts, those of nobility, and others, and let each of them cede again his own, of which he is thus deprived, and let him possess such goods peacefully.

(20) Also to every one within and without the principality, together with the abbots who have sat in the land, and who have their special regalia, and do not belong to the principality, to remain with their people and subjects in their faith and religion, to follow them also in their pensions and interest, and to leave them unhindered in this, according to the letter and content of the imperial and imperial decree.

(21) There shall also be high and low, whether ecclesiastical or secular, none excepted, who are obedient to their royal majesty, who have left the country or have been driven out of it. 21. The high and low classes, whether ecclesiastical or secular, no one except those who are obedient to their royal majesty, who have left the country or have been driven out of it, and whose property has been taken from them, shall be admitted again by Duke Ulrich, with peace and convoy, and their stolen goods shall be delivered to them again, and they shall be left in peace; and those who do not wish to live in the country, or who do not wish to suffer Duke Ulrich in it, shall be granted and permitted to sell their goods and to settle in other places of their liking.

22 Similarly, the clergy and seculars who have not been seated in the principality of Würtemberg, but nevertheless have rent, interest, and validity therein, are to be followed and given these without hindrance, and they are to be duly helped over the disobedient and those who do not keep them; but insofar as from the same places the Würtemberg their pension, interest and validity shall also not be inhibited, but shall follow in like manner.

23 Furthermore, Duke Ulrich, above mentioned, and his heirs, shall and will release the Roman Royal Majesty from their pension and claim against the estates of Swabia by this treaty. Majesty of the outstanding balance against the estates of the Confederation of Swabia, likewise against Duke Christoph and Count Georgen of Württemberg, by this treaty relieve them of their pension and demand, free them and hold them harmless. Also her Majesty's own and borrowed ordnance with its appurtenances, which in the recent surrender of the castle of Asperg, remain on the same castle, and as it has existed, deliver the same again and let it follow.

(24) Whatever other debts there may be in the land of Wuerttemberg shall be paid and satisfied, or at peace, by Duke Ulrich and his heirs, without any request that may be made to His Royal Majesty. Maj. shall be paid by Duke Ulrich and his heirs, and they shall be satisfied or put at peace.

(25) But as to such debts, outside of royal debt, by the royal power. Maj. debt, by the royal maj. Maj. for their own benefit, and not for the need of the country, which exceeds 20,000 gulden principal sum, the said Duke Ulrich shall not be obliged to pay.

26 S. L. shall also and will not relieve anyone of his existing pledge or bond without prior legal recognition; however, the article, as stated [8 21], considering: "It shall also be of high and low rank" 2c., is not applicable.

27) If, however, any pension or service money is prescribed by grace of the King's Majesty, which Duke Ulrich does not pay for servants, he may terminate such pension.

(28) And since there are also in the land of Württemberg several counties, pieces and estates which are in fief from the Crown of Bohemia, Duke Ulrich shall and will receive the same from the present Royal Majesty as reigning King of Bohemia. Maj. as reigning king of Bohemia. And this shall also be done by his heirs in due form and manner.

Item 29: Count Palatine Philip shall also be released from his promise, and other royal councillors and servants. Maj. councillors and servants, of the duty and vow made to Duke Ulrich and the Landgrave in the surrender of Hohen-Asperg, shall be released without payment, nor shall they be punished for what they have lost.

30th And so then the Elector of Saxony, above-mentioned, in place of and by authority of Württemberg and Hesse 2c., has presently approved and granted all these copied articles, and has also promised that Duke Ulrich shall execute and keep all the same of their contents for himself and his heirs.

and prescribe.

(31) That both of the princes reported, Wuerttemberg and Hesse, shall also have their men-at-arms cut up without seizure and rape of Imperial and Royal Majesty. Maj. as well as the other estates of the empire, be cut up and withdrawn.

32) On the other hand, we, as negotiators, have humbly requested the Roman Royal Majesty that Her Majesty grant him, Duke Ulrich, his son and their male heirs in marriage against our intercession. Maj. humbly requested that Her Majesty grant, for the sake of our intercession, that the land of Württemberg be and remain quietly granted to him, Duke Ulrich, his son and their legitimate male heirs, against the conditions as mentioned above, unhindered by Her Maj. or the same heirs.

(33) That also Her Roman Royal Majesty shall grant him and the Landgrave a considerable day. That their Roman Royal Majesty, upon their request, which they are to make to their Majesty between now and Invocavit, the more timely in the future, will set a considerable day at a convenient place, and then, upon their humble petition and self-request, graciously pardon them in their own person, or by their handsome embassy, with willing and humble footfalls, for past actions, and thereby reaffirm this peace that has been made.

34 On the other hand, both of their Lords are obedient to this, nor do theirs allow themselves to be used or attacked against Imperial and Royal Majesty and the Estates of the Realm. Maj. and the Estates of the Realm, nor allow themselves to be used for any offensive action or attack.

(35) Then Duke Ulrich shall also, on the same day, grant the fief of the land of Württemberg, as above mentioned, in his own person, as is customary, and receive and enfranchise it from the Royal Majesty. Maj. and be enfeoffed therewith.

(36) Thus also His Royal Majesty will diligently request Maj. diligently requests, 1) that Kais. Maj. will also graciously pardon the past action of the two Princes, Württemberg and Hesse, and confirm this treaty.

37 And when Her Imperial Maj. Maj. comes to the Empire of the German Nation, then Duke Ulrich and the Landgrave shall and will do a submissive footfall of their own person to Her Maj. and also abjure past acts of Her Maj.

38) All those who have served, aided and abetted both parties in this feud are hereby released from their worries; those who are still caught in this plot are also to be given free and released on a customary vow and promise not to leave the prison, and those who are still in prison are to be released from their worries.

1) "solicit" is either: work or: request.

Neither of them shall be harmed nor punished, neither in body nor in goods. And by this treaty all war expenses, expired by both parts, shall herewith be completely cancelled, and neither part shall make any demand against the other for this reason.

(39) All of the above-mentioned articles, as reported word for word with their appendices, have been graciously granted by the King's Majesty upon such our action and submissive request. Maj. has graciously granted, accepted, and promised to comply with all and any of them for themselves, their relatives, and their principals, and to live up to all of them in a friendly and thoughtful manner, also on account of and by authority of the two Princes of Würtemberg and Hesse.

40 And we Ferdinand, by the grace of God Roman King, do confess for ourselves and our descendants and heirs that this treaty has been established and executed with our gracious forbearance, knowledge, will and full word by the above-mentioned merchants, which consent we also hereby give thereto.

(41) We also speak and promise by our royal true words to comply and live up to the same unwaveringly; we also hereby confirm and ratify all that is required of us to confirm.

42) By the same token, by the grace of God, we Johann Friederich, Duke of Saxony, 2c., Elector, and hereby declare on behalf of ourselves, all our kinsmen in religion and electoral matters, and also by special authority of Duke Ulrich of Würtemberg and Landgrave Philip of Hesse, that we have approved and accepted all these above-written articles with their appendices for ourselves, the same our kinsmen, and our plenipotentiaries. We have immediately recognized and honored the Roman King on our behalf, and on behalf of those who are related to us; to the extent that we hereby recognize and honor him as Roman King (with the modesty that the reported Article 13], beginning: "In the event, however," contains and is capable of).

(43) We also agree and pledge, by our princely allegiance and true words, to observe all of the same articles as those contained herein, and to be faithful to the same, and to be faithful to the same in all things pertaining thereto, and to live by the same.

44 And after these rewritten articles have been proposed and acted upon by us, the merchants, in this matter, namely, so that the warring parties which Würtemberg and Hesse now have with each other may be separated as much as possible.

that both their beloved ones 1) shall do the royal majesty a considerable military service; in such a way that they send in her majesty's name 1500 armed horses and 3000 good servants, with necessary artillery, before Münster now. Majesty's name, send 1500 armed horses and 3000 good servants, with the necessary artillery, before Münster, and help the bishop to conquer this city in the name and by order of the Imperial Majesty. Majesty, help the bishop to conquer it, and that the same cavalymen and servants shall be related to the royal Majesty and shall obey the same command.

45 And if the necessity of Münster requires that the city not be conquered before that time, it shall be maintained for three months at the expense and expense of both princes. Item, after the royal majesty has previously had a share in the castle Hohentwiel, situated in Hegau, that against the manifold of her majesty's gracious indulgence, which she did to the duke of Würtemberg in this action, the remaining duke Ulrich's share in it, with all belonging, will be hereditarily pursued and delivered. Item, that Duke Ulrich's husband is to remain calm about her expulsion, which she has had in the country up to now.

46) That also the common countryside of Würtemberg should insure the above-mentioned contracted articles, which Duke Ulrich has prescribed for himself and his heirs, for themselves, as much as they are concerned to keep and to live by, in addition to Duke Ulrich's assurance.

47) Item, after the Elector of Saxony also recalled an article concerning Count Georgen of Würtemberg, in such a way that the same should be left with the Würtemberg fiefs, that the Royal Majesty has not yet been able to decide here on the grounds that Her Majesty has not kept the letters concerning the elevation of the land to a principality, as well as the enfeoffment of Duke Ulrich. Majesty has not yet been able to decide here, on the grounds that Her Majesty did not have the letters concerning the elevation of the state of Würtemberg to a principality, as well as the enfeoffment of Duke Ulrich, in her hands.

48) Likewise, that the said Elector of Saxony also indicates that Würtemberg and Hesse have withdrawn Mr. Dietrich Späten and Mr. Georgen von Straußen in this treaty, which the Royal Majesty, since the whole feud is to be reconciled, and otherwise reconciled between all the relatives, and her Majesty has not attracted anyone therein, would not have thought fair.

49 And this time, however, from such articles as have been narrated, further action has been taken in such a way that the Elector of Saxony, for the very best of his F. Gn. Councillors to the two Princes mentioned.

Of the actions taken between the imperial and papal envoys on the one hand, and the protesting estates on the other, because of a concilii to be called.

Of the imperial and papal call for a concilii half, and of both sides' audience with the Elector of Saxony.

This document is found in Hortleeder, tom. I, lii. I, aap. 13, p. 72 and in Lünig's Reichs-Archiv, pari. 6tn. aont. I, p. 606. variants of the copy letter which the Churfürst sent to the Landgrave are found in Neudecker's "Aktenstücke," p. 85 f. We have inserted the additions of the same in square brackets.

1. Carolus, by the Grace of God, Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire. Reverend in God Fathers, venerable and high-born dear friends, nephews, grandfathers, electors, princes; also well-born, honorable, noble, devout and dear faithful, who out of such inclination and desire of our imperial mind, for the promotion and increase of the Holy Empire, and especially of the laudable German nation for good welfare, have graciously undertaken and done nothing higher and more vehement, than the matter of the discord of our Christian religion, from which, as an origin, much Cause of much evil, not only in faith, but also in worldly and temporal being, hitherto arisen, seeks to unite and lay down.

(2) And after we have often had our commissioners and orators from many imperial congresses act on the grounds of such disputes, and we ourselves have endeavored with particular diligence at recent imperial congresses at Augsburg and Regensburg, and have omitted nothing that might have been helpful in putting an end to such disputes.

3. Since, however, after all practiced action, no other way has been discussed and found by your friendship, loved ones, devotion, and you, as well as other estates of the realm, by which such discord 1) and great danger and confusion of all things might be conveniently put away, or quieted 2) except that a common concilium should be announced; and such [some] way, since the things otherwise become the longer the worse, is considered necessary, and is desired by us entirely in subservience: So we have, for the benefit of the common Christianity, and because of your friendship, love, devotion, and your, and also other of the kingdom's estates, diligent, diligent request, immediately after the march against the Turk, which we, in view of that tyrant's quick and unforeseen departure, and also of the winter matter before us, could not well accomplish, for the satisfaction of the German nation and so that a common concilium would be proclaimed in Christendom, and directed our minds to appeal to papal holiness for such, to promote and obtain it, and for this reason took our way to Italy. And when the papal holiness, regardless of the difficult winter time and ways, also regardless of her health and age, willingly came before us to this city of Bononia, and showed herself for such Christian action with all fatherly mind and desire in such a way that nothing was lacking with her holiness for her part and office. And as far as the call for the General Council is concerned, after we have informed his Holiness of the danger and gravity of the present events and matters, and of your friendship, love and devotion, and of your, and also other imperial estates', advice, consideration and request with special diligence, as we have promised and granted such to your friendship, love, devotion and to you, and also to other imperial estates.

1) Copy writing: Discord.

2) In the old edition: "put".

3) Copy writing: heavy printing.

His Holiness, on account of her papal office, out of fatherly love for common Christianity, has immediately granted such a request for a common council quite willingly and with an eager mind, and has not allowed it with less diligence and eagerness than we have requested, as your friendship, love, devotion, and you will actually hear from his Holiness' letter. And move your Holiness very carefully how highly necessary it is for other Christian kings, princes, and potentates to grant such a thing, and ask your Holiness especially to prevent that this work, so undertaken for the benefit of common Christendom, be not prevented by some disadvantages, lest also a division [and] schism [and thereby] such a salutary thing be despoiled.

4. For this reason, and for the greater progress of the aforementioned General Council, and so that nothing might be omitted that would be helpful to this cause, Her Holiness has immediately sought the minds and opinions of other kings and Christian princes to proclaim and bring about the aforementioned Council, and has paternally exhorted and reminded them of this Christian work; Which then their holiness by writings and their ambassadors has so diligently and so diligently subjected, that one hopes for the same kings, princes, and potentates to grant and answer in the most beneficial way and before our departure from Italy, and such a grant and answer as is well befitting and due to the same office [and] title against the inclination of common Christianity.

(5) We have given all this to your friendship, love, devotion, and [to you, so that] (6) you may find that we have seen your friendship, love, devotion, and you, and that we have been faithful to our promise, in a kind and gracious way.

006 And thereupon we desire, and beseech your friendship, and love, and devotion, and you, kindly and graciously, and in virtue of your kindred, that your friendship, and love, and devotion, and you, may be toward us and toward common peace and unity; that your friendship, and love, and devotion, and you, may be toward us, and toward common peace and unity; that your friendship, and love, and devotion, and you, may be toward us, and toward common peace and unity.

4) So the copy writing, Hortleder and after him Walch: "duly".

5) Hortleder and Walch: "that not sth. by" 2c.

6) Inserted by us to make some sense. - In the following we have put instead of: "would like": "would like".

We are convinced that you and yourselves, in the meantime and while the matters in question are being dealt with and the General Council announced and held, want to live, exist and remain in good friendship, peace and unity; By this means, the matters in question and the proceedings of the Council will be especially promoted, and your friendship, love, devotion and you will do what is suitable for common unity, and your friendship, love, devotion and you will be especially due and respected, and our final will and opinion will be done, and your friendship, love, devotion and you will be kindly and graciously blamed, and recognized, and never again forgotten for good. Hort leather, toni. I. lik. I. vap. 14, p. 73. - The same letter of invitation, but addressed to Saxon County, is printed in D. C. G. Neudecker's "Merkwürdige Aktenstücke aus dem Zeitalter der Reformation", p. 82, in another translation, which the Elector had made "in haste" (Neudecker I. e. p. 80).

Pope Clement the Seventh, to the venerable brothers, bishops and dear sons, nobles, princes, prelates, counts, lords, knights, cities and estates of the Swabian district in general and in particular.

Venerable Brethren and Beloved Sons, Hail and Papal Blessing! When we heard that your noble nation had recently desired, and most earnestly desired, that a common council should be appointed by us for the settlement of your controversy in the holy religion, we never failed in the same, not only with our consent, but also (as is customary) with the request of other princes.

1) We have inserted these signatures from Neudecker's "Actenstücke", but changed "2c." to spt. at the end. Such gross errors are not rare in Neudecker, e. g. p. 5: ruagnus instead of moZuut (LloZuntius).

As this can be announced to the most noble of our dear sons in Christ, Carolo, Roman Emperor, and Ferdinando, Roman King, to whom we wrote two years ago, as to other princes, and exhorted them all to consent to it with good will and unanimity. But this action of ours has been cut off by the armament and the invasion of the Turks in Hungary and Germany, and therefore the minds of all the princes have been put in doubt.

2. But as soon as this enemy, by the grace of God and of the aforementioned emperor and king's power, and also our help, has been driven away, and we have recently heard that a concilium is once again desired: we have thereupon, as the truly owed service first to God Almighty, then to all believers in Christ in general, and subsequently to your nation, which we especially love and hold in high esteem, never want to deny or refuse, as soon as we learn of the Emperor's arrival in Italy, and that he is about to cross into Hispania, and that he would sail in Hispania at the earliest, and had received sufficient report of his good conduct, Christian and beneficial suggestions, ourselves in our own person, although we with all complaints, and by recent illness weak, even as the winter was most severe, before Imperial Majesty the Emperor. Majesty. We did not shy away from any danger, neither of the way nor of life, so that we could talk to the Emperor himself (who, as we had been told, would request and ask of us) about common benefits and especially about these things before he left; who, when he came after us to Bononiam, and, in the manner of his noble Christian mind towards God, showed us diligence towards the realm, and inclined will towards your nation (in all of which he does not yield to any emperor) not only yours, but first of all his and his brother's named desire and request (concerning the appointment of the Concilii). Although this desire of his Majesty's has never before been brought to our attention Although this desire of his Majesty's has never been repugnant to us before, we have now been moved even further to it by the request and plea of such a powerful prince, who is excellent in all praise (if anything else might have been added to our previous inclined will), and have been confirmed in this.

003 And there shall have been no delay with us at all, where we of other kings, princes, and potentates also, as of her majesty, would have had unanimous consent. For it is to our own

It is not hidden from us that all members and nations of Christendom should be exhorted to the assembly of a common council, and at least, as much as possible for us and on our side, be brought to it, and this not only because of old custom, but also because of unanimous agreement. Therefore we have resolved to carry out our action again (to again exhort the other princes to this and to obtain their consent, as was also begun by us two years ago, but was omitted by frightening the cruel enemy), to continue in it, and, which God Almighty will graciously grant us, in which we will not cease to exert all diligence, effort and labor against God and man, neither with letters, messages, exhortations nor petitions, so that the common concilium that has been called for may be scheduled and held as soon as possible.

(4) And what the other kings, princes, and potentates think and will, and what they decide to do in this holy matter, and give us for answer, we will bring to your knowledge in the most beneficial way. All of which we wish to inform you of, and request that you take it for granted that, in view of our office and the most noble Emperor and his brother's authority, we are also moved by your nation's welfare, peace, and tranquility to do nothing that would not be for the benefit, peace, and security of all common Christendom, and for the honor of our holy religion, also to our holy religion's honor, prosperity, and acceptance, and especially what might be profitable in some way for the unification of your contentious nation, which is the foundation of the holy empire, the strength and adornment of all Christendom, and has always been dear to us through special affection. Given in our city of Bononia, under the fisherman's ring, on the tenth day of Januarii in the year 1533, the tenth year of our papacy.

Preface.

Now for many years there has been a common desire and wish among almost all pious Christians for a common Christian council, in which one would like to rectify the grievances and abuses that have occurred in all the churches up to this time, and to settle the controversial matters of doctrine that have arisen from them, and to bring them into a Christian union. Now there are some who have thought that such a desire or concilium has been prevented by the pope and his own until now, who do not like to hear about the reformation of the church, for the reason that they fear the example of the concilium at Costnitz, in which a concilium was set up over the pope and acted almost harshly with popes, as subjects, because they fear that it might happen to them again. For this reason, they also wrote and argued vehemently at the time of the concilium at Costnitz that the pope was over the concilium; just as the pope Eugenius subsequently suspended the next concilium at Basel, and began another one at "Pis" to confirm and maintain the pope's supposed supremacy over a concilium.

And in such papal councils nothing else is decided except what serves to strengthen such papal supremacy and its abuses. In the aforementioned Pisa Council it was decided that the pope should be the supreme person in all the world and a true governor of God on earth, to whom all men should be subject for the salvation of their souls; item, that one should believe in purgatory; item, that one should eat unleavened bread, and many other such things. Nothing, however, has ever been said of the true principalities of the Christian faith, nor of the abuses and offences which are committed and practised against them, all of which every pious Christian is commanded to judge and consider.

But we should all praise and honor our dear pious emperor that he has always held fast to such desire, and has not refrained from it with right Christian earnestness and mind, until he has raised elements septimo with the pope, that the said pope has granted to hold a concilium, though with articles attached, as may be read from the following.

Now it behooves all of us who are called and want to be Christians to support our pious emperor and his faithful diligence, and to help him to a blessed end with prayers and cries to heaven to the Father of all mercy, and whatever else we are able to do. For although a Christian council is being formed, it must nevertheless be based on diligent prayer and faithful work against the enemy of the truth, who does not like to leave the fundamentals of the faith and the abuses that strive against them.

This request of the Pope from the Concilio to the Elector of Saxony and his relatives, together with their answer, is omitted from the print, as a good example that other Christian lords and people also gain a serious mind and inclined heart for the Concilio, as they see and hear here that these Christian, praiseworthy princes and lords do and show in deed, and we therefore all strive to attain with united prayer, so that we may become worthy to see a truly Christian Concilium one day. May our dear Lord Jesus Christ help us, with God the Father and the Holy Spirit, some God, praised forever and ever, amen.

The Imperial and Papal Envoys. Envoy Werbung an Churfürst Johann Friedrich zu Sachsen wegen des künftigen Concilii.

001 When, some months ago, the pope and the Roman emperor met in Bononia, and discussed many great and serious matters, and especially religion, and united in some of these matters, the pope would have done well. Maj. met in Bononia, and discussed many great and serious matters, and especially religion, and united on some of these matters: so the pope would have considered it convenient and good that some should be sent to the princes of the German nation for this purpose.

002 And though the greatness of this bargain might have required that such men as were of greater reputation and understanding should have been sent: yet, notwithstanding all pretended excuses, the pope would have commanded him to go: therefore also he would have come to my most gracious lord, the elector of the realm, to present to his electoral graces his command, which he had from the pope. 1)

1) From this paragraph and the following one one sees that we have to do here with a recapitulation of what the papal legate Hugo Rango presented to the Elector.

003 Which the pope's command, but the emperor's will, had thus determined and decreed.

004 But in order that the more faith might be given him in the advertisement which he was about to make, he desired to have his letters of credence delivered before he told the things.

5th After the same letter of credence was handed over, he spoke the following opinion:

(6) How good of time that Pope Clement the Seventh, by divine providence, should have come to the papal see, had he considered nothing higher nor more diligent than how some divisions which had arisen in the German nation on account of religion might be quieted and put away, so that he and the church might govern and live so much more peacefully.

7th For this reason he has often sent excellent, learned and skilful men to the German nation, who were to make the greatest effort to quench the reported dispute; but this has not yet been achieved in any way.

(8) After this, however, it came to pass, no doubt by special divine providence, that Imperial Majesty had come from Hispania and had turned to Italy. Maj. had come from Hispania and had turned to Italy, thinking to move further into the German nation, he would have been more consoling and full of hope, since they had compared themselves with each other for the sake of other remarkable things and had decided to raise these matters of religion also to his liking.

9th But when the imperial majesty came to the German nation afterwards, her majesty would have been in no want of diligence to bring Germany back to the former way of religion.

(10) Her Majesty has also appointed and held more than one general Imperial Diet for this purpose, which would have done little to help the cause, without a doubt because of the cruel suit of the hereditary enemy of the Christian name, the Turk, which the Imperial Majesty would have made in the disruption of their plan. Majesty would have done to their intention in the disruption.

(11) But when the emperor's majesty came to Italy and to Bononia, the pope spoke and acted much about these matters with the emperor. Maj. came elsewhere in Italy and against Bonavia, the pope talked and acted much about these matters with the emperor, so that his imperial majesty let himself be heard that there was no convenient means or way to remedy such matters other than a common council. Maj. let it be heard that there was no more convenient means or way to remedy such matters than a common council, which the German princes also desired.

(12) Therefore, so that no lack would be found in the pope, and so that the emperor's desire and concern would be sufficient. Maj.'s desire and concern, he would have been satisfied that a concilium be held.

013 Therefore he, the Nuncius, would be dispatched by the pope to the Elector of Saxony to announce to his electoral grace that the pope would be requested to hold a concilium.

014 But since it would be necessary, if a council were to be held, to consider some things beforehand, as namely, in what manner and in what form the same should be held, item, in what place it should be most conveniently placed, and thirdly, for what time?

(15) For this reason, the pope had several articles drawn up according to which the council was to be conducted and held.

016 Some of them questioned the manner of the council, that it should be a free and common council, and such a council as the fathers of the church of old held, of which it might well and truly be said, that if two or three of them were gathered together in his name, he would be in the midst of them, without doubt that the Holy Ghost was with the fathers in such councils.

017 Secondly, that they who would be in such a council should consent to hold the same conclusions and determinations. For otherwise it would be a vain endeavor to determine and decide something in a concilio, where it should not be accepted and kept; as otherwise it would be a vain thing to establish law, where the same would not be lived up to and administered.

(18) Thirdly, whoever could not come to the Concilio in person, that he might send his embassy and lawyers.

019 Fourthly, that no innovation should be made until the final completion of the Concilii.

(20) Fifthly, as to the place of painting, the pope would have had all sorts of considerations and concerns. For the places of the churches must be convenient for this purpose because of many circumstances, and among other things, that there is no famine there, but food and drink in convenient purchase, and a healthy air, which is comfortable for those who come there from all over the world.

021 Therefore, and in consideration of such circumstances, the pope would have thought of three places, as Mantua, for the same city was an imperial city, and near to the German nation, there was also a good wholesome air, and all things at a fair purchase, or Placentia, or Bononia.

022 Therefore it shall be at the pleasure of the princes to choose and to accept any of the places of painting which they will.

23) Sixthly, if some princes would refuse to come to such a council, or to send theirs with authority, or would leave it, that nevertheless the pope should proceed with the council.

(24) The seventh, if any person shall complain of the act and determination of the Council, is that then Imperial Majesty and other Christian kings and princes shall assist the pope and the church. Majesty and other Christian kings and princes shall stand by the pope and the church, protect him, and help to handle him, so that no further damage is done to him and the church, nor to their goods.

025 And if any man should be questioned in this matter, why the council should not be appointed and named at once, his answer and report would be, that therefore it could not have been done in haste, because necessity requires that all the circumstances of the council should be well considered beforehand.

26 And because Imperial Majesty has often promised the German nation that a concilium should be celebrated. Majesty has often promised the German nation at so many imperial congresses that a concilium should be celebrated, therefore also Imperial Majesty would have allowed it to be sent to the princes and princes of the German nation to announce the Pope's approval. Majesty would have pleased that it be sent to the princes and princes of the German nation to indicate the Pope's approval.

(27) (To the eighth) 1) Therefore the pope would be completely willing, if the Christian kings and potentates had acted beforehand on the articles in question, that he should then immediately, within six months, write out the concilium, so that it should then be begun within a year.

28. thereupon has sent my most gracious lord the often touched articles in writing, and asked that he would let himself be heard from them with a kind and favorable answer.

29 Thereupon the imperial orator immediately arose, and spoke the following opinion in Latin.

(30) Since, out of the urgency of the matter, Imperial Majesty Oratores and the Princes and Estates of the Empire of the German Nation have hitherto met much and often, and have discussed how the division of religion in the Empire might be remedied, nothing fruitful has been achieved. Since, due to the urgent nature of the matter, the Imperial Majesty's Orators, and the princes and estates of the Empire of the German Nation have been in contact with one another many times and have discussed how the division of religion in the Empire might be remedied, and since nothing fruitful has been accomplished to date, it was considered most convenient to hold a council, which the Imperial Majesty recently received at Bononia from the pope. Majesty had recently received at Bononia from the Pope. And namely, that it should be held and carried out in time and place, also in form.

as the venerable lord, the papal envoy, spoke of it by length. And he would therefore be sent by the Emperor's Majesty Majesty, that he should testify by Imperial Maj. Maj. that the pope had granted the concilium. And because the papal delegate 1) spoke intelligently about it, he considered it unnecessary that he should endure my most gracious lord with longer speeches.

31 His request is that H. C. F. G. give the Pope's envoy a statement of the whole faith, and let himself be heard with a good answer.

32) Thereupon my most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c., has let it be known to them that he will accept their advertisement, on account of the Pope and Imperial Majesty. Majesty, in addition to surrendering their credentials and the articles presented, for the sake of Imperial Majesty. Majesty's half humbly noted. Because these matters are great and important, their great necessity requires them to take the matters into consideration, which, with God's help, S. C. F. G. would most beneficially like to do, and as soon as they have received the answer, to notify them of the same for the advancement of the matters, with the attached request that they not bear the burden of the delay.

(33) The papal nuncio said that the C.F.G. would be wise not to give an answer so soon and so carelessly, for the matters and affairs would need good consideration. For in great matters it would be careless to give an answer soon, and it would be difficult to give an answer. For this reason, they would willingly give his Electoral Grace as much time and space as possible to write a reply.

34) As his electoral graces of the following Wednesday [June 11] 2) have given an answer to these Roman Imperial Majesties and the Pope. Majesty and the Pope's sent ones, by virtue of the following articles, 3) which have been delivered to them at their request in Latin, signed by his electoral grace.

1) Addition: "certainly" (Walch).

2) See "Lehre und Wehre," Vol. 36, pp. 250 and 252. Similarly Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. VIII, 1086, note.

3) The "articles" mentioned here are not the eight articles of the pope that follow immediately, about which the Elector first obtained Luther's objections, but the sixteen articles named in Luther's second objection, No. 1214. See the citations given in the preceding note. It is not to be assumed that the Elector delivered the eight articles handed over to him "signed by him" to the envoys on the next day, June 4 (thus one interprets the words: "the following Wednesday").

The articles, at that time [June 3] of his electoral grace by the papal ...to the skilled.

First, that the Universal and General Councils, which are to be written out and held, shall be free, and according to the usual custom of the church, held from many hundred years ago, from the beginning and beginning of the common and universal councils until the present time, shall also proceed in this manner.

Secondly, that those who are to be in the council should promise and commit themselves to keep and obey the council's decrees and what is decided therein.

Thirdly, that those who are prevented from coming to such a council by bona fide causes shall nevertheless send and discharge their lawful procurators and attorneys, with their sufficient authority.

Fourthly, that also in the meantime in the disputed articles of the holy faith in German lands no innovation is made nor undertaken by them, but that the matters remain peaceful until the concilium is concluded and dismissed.

Fifthly, that all men now consent and resolve, and unite, which shall be the place of the Concilium, to hold the Concilium there: for otherwise, and without that, all armament, food, labour, and toil, would be in vain. And because necessity requires that such a place be chosen, which, as much as possible, will be convenient to all those who are to come and appear at the council.

Therefore the pope considers it, and not without reason, that of the three cities mentioned below, the best and most convenient should be one for the council, namely, Mantua, Bononia, Placentia. For the reason that they are all solid, safe, spacious and large, also in good, fertile land and in good air, and also that they are much closer to the German nation and more convenient than all the other countries of the Transylvanian, 4) and outside the German nation.

Sixthly, although some princes, potentates, and members of Christendom may not wish to allow themselves to be involved in such a godly and Christian matter without just and reasonable cause, and may disobediently refuse and refuse to write out and keep the council, the pope nevertheless intends to write out the above council, and to continue with the best part (as reported).

4) "Überbürgische"

- over-mountain.

Seventhly, it is also just and reasonable that, if some should hinder the holy work of the council by some means, or oppose its agreement, conclusion, and statutes, and disobey them, or without cause apostatize from the pope, then and in such a case, all and every one of the others who are of a better opinion, and who are in harmony with the pope, should act against him, or to do something unfriendly against him, that then and in such a case, against them all and every one, the others, who are of better opinion and of one mind, should assist the pope and the papal see, and help with all their means.

Eighth, if the pope receives an answer from the Roman king and the princes of the German nation, as well as from other Christian kings, on the basis of the above-mentioned articles, and, as he hopes, obtains and receives his will and favor, the pope hereby undertakes and declares that he will then, within half a year, prepare the council, and to call for the same council within a year, so that in the meantime all that is needed for the council may be prepared in the city ordered for it, and those who must be in such council may prepare and send themselves for such a journey, and there present themselves from the lands near the sea.

Hugo Rango, count, bishop of Reggio 1) and prince, also papal nuncio.

Lambertus of Briarerde, ssz.

1213: The Elector John Frederick of Saxony the other day [June 4] thereupon dilatory answer given to both envoys.

See the previous number.

(1) That the Pope and Imperial Majesty have decided to proclaim and assemble a council. Majesty have decided to proclaim and assemble a council, Duke Hans Frederick of Saxony, Elector 2c., is especially pleased about this, and has also heard nothing better.

002 For his electoral graces knew that it was a great and unavoidable need of the common Christians.

(3) Since the almighty God (whom his princely grace would ask for, and also command to be asked for in S. C. F. G. churches) will also give grace that a divine, common, free Christian concilium, as Imperial Majesty has graciously promised the German nation many times, will be held and especially in such a way that in it Christian and lawful Christianity will be established. Majesty has graciously promised the German nation, and especially in such a way that in it Christian and lawful and in it God's word will judge, as our dear Lord Christ Himself says John, 12, v. 48: "The word which I have spoken, that shall judge him at the last day," without doubt, the Almighty God will bestow His grace, so that all division and complaining will result in true, right, Christian unity, also in peace and all good.

(4) Whatever his C. F. G. would like to do for themselves, and advise, promote, and help other C. F. G. relatives, that C. F. G. would like to do with a special, cheerful, and inclined will.

(5) And S. C. F. G. would be entirely inclined to let themselves be heard in response to the advertisement made by the Pope and Imperial Majesty. Maj. with a final answer to them this time; yet they themselves know and have heard that there are more princes, counts, cities and estates in the Empire of the German Nation who hold to the doctrine and God's word, which abides forever, than His Electoral Grace His Father, Duke John, Elector (of high and blessed memory), and the said estates and cities publicly confessed at the Imperial Diet of Augsburg before Imperial Majesty, with which His Electoral Grace, Duke John, Elector of Augsburg, and the said estates and cities publicly confessed at the Imperial Diet of Augsburg before Imperial Majesty, with which His Electoral Grace, Duke John, Elector of Augsburg, and the said estates and cities publicly confessed at the Imperial Diet of Augsburg. Majesty, with whom his electoral graces stand in this for one part, behind which his electoral graces are to give such a final answer. His Elector's Grace would not be able to give such a final answer; so, as they should be respected, it would not serve the cause if they could not be heard to give an equal and unanimous answer.

(6) But his electoral graces would not save them, because the pope and imperial majesty wrote from Bononia last winter to the estates of the German nation, and put off a council and the sending of their message. Majesty wrote last winter from Bononia to the Estates of the German Nation, putting off a council and the sending of their message: so his Electoral Grace, for these and other reasons, had adjourned with his Electoral Grace's kinsmen for the coming of John. His Electoral Grace, for these and other reasons, has adjourned with his electoral relatives for the time to come, in the opinion of dealing with them, because they wanted to have their part heard in this on account of the pre-touched papal and imperial writings.

(7) Therefore, it is his electoral grace's request and intention that there be no difficulty or displeasure in this. For his Electoral Grace would then report to their fellow kinsmen on their petition and application, and from this decide with them on a unanimous and Christian answer, and have all of them heard by means of a letter or writing to them. And ask them to let his Electoral Grace know where they are to be found at that time, or else that they can make it known to them.

on Wednesday, Thursday, or Friday after St. John's Day?) of his Electoral Grace and Landgrave Philip of Hesse to Schmalkalden, since they will then be with each other.

(8) For His Electoral Grace's mind and opinion, with God's help and grace, shall certainly be directed in such a way that it intends to act and walk by God's grace and help, so that both those who now live on earth, and those who would like to be on earth after our mortal departure, shall experience with reason and truth that His Electoral Grace has so far considered nothing dearer, nothing higher, nothing more valuable, and for this, with God's help, they want to consider the remaining time of their lives as pure, salvific, and blessed. Grace has hitherto respected nothing dearer, nothing higher, nothing more valuable, and for this, with God's help, they want to respect the rest of their lives, except the pure, salvific and beatific Word of God, and the true, righteous worship of God, and consequently the common peace of the land, not only in the German nation, but also of the entire Holy Roman Empire and Christendom. The aim is to promote and render faithful obedience and submissiveness to the Roman Imperial Majesty, as his authority ordered by God and his most gracious Lord.

1214 Luther's and his colleagues' four concerns regarding the above advertisement.

These four concerns are found in the Eisleben edition, Vol. II, p. 324; in the Altenburg edition, Vol. VI, p. 130; in the Leipzig edition, Vol. XXI, p. 120; in the Erlangen edition, Vol. 55, p. 14 and in De Wette, Vol. I V, p. 454, with the date: "middle of June", based on Luther's letter to Hausmann of June 16 (No. 1215). From June 15 until around St. John's Day, the Elector personally consulted with the theologians in Wittenberg. The first two concerns will have to be set earlier, and were sent from Wittenberg to Weimar; the last two later, the same will have been sent to Schmalkalden.

a. Luther's first concern.

Between June 4 and 10, 1533.

(1) If the first article were clear and certain what the pope meant by it, I would have no lack of the other articles (for myself). For where he clearly showed that he wanted to hold a council according to God's word, and not according to his own custom, and committed himself to it, there should be no question whether we would appear, be obedient, and help to exegete. For not only should we do so, but we would also be obligated to do so, as to obey God Himself.

1) That is, the 25th, 26th, or 27th of June.

002 But now this same article is evil and treacherous, and shuneth the light, and creepeth in the darkness, as half an angel and half a devil; saying, it shall be a free concilium, siout ab iuitio, that is, as from the beginning. If by this he means the first Concilium, and especially the apostles at Jerusalem, as is written in the Acts of the Apostles on the fifteenth and on the sixteenth, then it must be judged according to God's word. For the apostles concluded from God's words and works 2c. Who would not follow them? 2c. Again he speaks: According to the custom of the Church from of old, until this time; hiemit he also comprehends the last Concilia, as that at Costnitz, at Basle, at Pisa, and the most shameful to the Lateran at Rome, the last held under Pope Leo the Tenth, which was a mockery and reproach to all the world. Therefore his opinion must be that he wants to make such a council, in which the acts and deeds of such councils are read to us as if we did not know them before. And because this is the opinion, no concilium may be made, for it has long since been held, and not only decided, but has now been executed against us for more than twelve years with banishment, fire, water, sword, and all power and cunning, so that it may not be read to us again at a concilium; we knew it and have experienced it all too well.

(3) In sum, a consilium sisut ab iuitio, as the first were, we understand it no other way, nor can we understand it any other way, than a concilium according to God's word and works. But a concilium according to custom, as was the case at Costnitz and its like, is called a concilium against God's word, according to human conceit and will.

4th Because the two, namely, according to the word of God and against the word of God, in the same mouth of the pope, prove themselves to be lies, it must be understood that in the first article the pope mocks and deceives the emperor together with our request. For such a council is not desired by us, nor is it promised or decided in the imperial diets; yet he, the liar, calls it a free council; he understands "free" for himself alone, that he wants to do in it as has been customary and done up to now, freely and without hindrance.

005 Above this also is that of his lying, a sign that he boasts of the conciliar custom (though it is not to be suffered), and yet does not himself keep it in these articles; for this is a new thing, and not used before, nor ever heard of, that before the concilium is written, he obliges us and every one to keep what he will say to us, and we do not know what he will say. Here he is able to speak clearly and distinctly, and does not murmur in the dark, but gives to understand what kind of concilium he wants to hold, liberum so, that is, what pleases him.

(6) The matter, however, for which a concilium is desired and necessary, concerns the pope and his conciliar custom themselves, and they must be part, and not judge, but the word of God shall judge between the pope and his conciliar and us: therefore it is called a Christian, and not a papal concilium. It is not controversies in Germania (as he calls it), it is controversies of all Christendom, for the sake of the word of God, against the pope and his teaching, and Christendom desires a concilium and judgment or testimony from the word of God and the papacy; there it is.

b. Luther's other concern.

Between June 4 and 10, 1533.

(1) My counsel and good opinion is, not to oppose the sixteen articles, but to accept them confidently, so that the pope's mouth may be shut: "For they are not presented out of necessity of things, but for mischievousness, that they may have cause to blame us all for mischief, and to cry-?" Behold, the Lutherans will do nothing, yield nothing, suffer nothing, they will not grant in obedience to the Concilii, they will not have the place of pain, they will not have the place of death.

1) These sixteen articles, which Luther here and also ^5 in this objection advises to accept, must be a different set of articles from the eight articles of the Pope (Col. 1869), because the latter are decisively rejected and rejected from beginning to end, especially on the basis of the first article, so also in ? 4 of this objection, in No. 1316, H32, and elsewhere.

2) Instead of "streuen" in the editions, the original reads "schreien" (Burkhardt, p. 214).

do not want to help exegeting, they want to have everything according to their liking, they want to be the concilium themselves. Now what is the fault that there is no concilium? The pope would like it 2c. To prevent such a clamor, it would be good for us to keep the good cheer, and let such articles please us, and strive to bring the bad cheer on the pope himself, namely, thus:

(2) At all imperial congresses it has been requested that a free Christian council be established, and it has finally been promised that the imperial majesty shall work for it with the pope. Majesty should work for this with the Pope. Now the pope adds in the first article, and rejects such a request, and does not want to do it, and speaks out insipidly that he wants to make a council according to the previous way and custom, although he and we and everyone are well aware that no one has asked for such a council. And do as it is written in the Gospel, If a child asked for bread, and his father gave him a stone, or a serpent for a fish, or a scorpion for an egg. So here also, when one asks for a free Christian concilium, the pope has the ears of a magistrate, and gives us a concilium according to the former manner, that is, not a free Christian concilium. Because he refuses and rejects such a request for a free Christian concilium, and rebukes us for it, we must let it happen, and suffer, and command the things to Christ.

(3) For we are not permitted to have a conciliar meeting after the former manner, neither do we wish to have it; much less may the pope have it. For we know well beforehand what must and should be concluded in a concilium held in the former manner, namely, that the former concilia should first be confirmed anew; then it is already done, and an end is decided to the new concilium. Thus the Costnitz Concilium is such a delicious, excellent Concilium, held according to the former manner, that if the pope made a hundred Conciliums according to the former manner, none would be so delicious. What do we want to have such great expense and trouble for nothing, if we neither want nor need a council in the former way, and the pope does not need it either, much less? For in the Costnitz Conciliar nothing is forgotten, but more than abundantly set and ordered, which is and ought to be the former manner and custom.

to teach, to live, to avoid, to do, to leave in the papacy 2c. And has come into such strong execution that countless blood has been shed over it between Germans and Bohemians, and many thousands of Christians have been martyred, burned, and persecuted over it, and there is still no end to such execution and persecution. What more do you want after the former way of Concilia? Perhaps the pope himself seeks such an execution of his new Concilii between the Germans themselves, as he did before between Germans and Bohemia, the tiresome bloodhound and murderer.

004 If therefore we consent to this first article, we have already revoked and denied our confession and apology, and have profaned and destroyed all our doctrine and actions hitherto practised, and have confirmed and accepted the pope in all his abominations; and our thing must be called and remain vain error, and the pope's vain truth. But God be for it.

Now this is certain and beyond all doubt, that the pope cannot suffer a Christian, free concilium (for he well sees how it must fall down), nor can he give any other than according to the foregoing. Therefore we keep the glimpses where we accept the sixteen articles cheerfully and without refusal, and cry out about his neck in his first article, that in it he so wantonly rejects the request of the emperor, the empire, and all of us, and directs us with our request into the dog's corner. And wants to hear no one, neither God, emperor, empire, nor us, but wants to be and remain God himself, in defiance of all Christians and the whole world, and make, create, do and leave what pleases him, as he did at Costnitz; he wants to call this a concilium. But the devil asks for such a council, and I do not.

c. Luther's and his colleagues' third concern.

Between the 25th and 30th of June 1533.

1) To name Concilia in the scripture 1) to the embassy is very dangerous, and quite unnecessary in this place. For here

1) No. 1216.

Nothing else is reported, except that the old and new conciliarities are unequal. (2) There is no need to tell us about the churches, and it is not said that we want to have a trial of the old churches, or that we should judge by them. But it is put in for our benefit, that the old churches are not against us in doctrine. For the doctrine is said to be arinitats, and so that its oration is not understood by the ceremonies, even though the same are not contrary to us.

Of counter-articles.

002 We mean that in every way we are to be prevented from being interpreted; we are going about to prevent the council. For since other nations would like to have a council, and hope that something fruitful will be done in it, the pope will want to blame all the displeasure of the prevention on us, so as to embitter them even more severely against us. But if we rest on this article, which all nations also cry out for, that things should be judged according to God's word 3) and not according to papal laws 2c., then we remain unfortunate, and no one can punish it with good grace and equity. Thus other nations are as tired of papal authority and monastic doctrine as the German nation.

(3) There is also only 4) one article that is primarily concerned, namely the first, that a free Christian concilium be held, that is, how the trial is to be conducted. This article has already been reported and opposed in the answer given 2) and is requested clearly enough by Imperial Majesty. Majesty is asked and reminded clearly enough in it to have the understanding that our matters be heard properly and sufficiently, and judged from the clear Word of God.

(4) But that one should ask further and in particular how the trial should be held, where impartial judges are to be sought and taken 2) Of this it is dangerous to put articles.

005 And it is safer to thrust it home to the emperor in gensrs, that he may have the understanding, that it may be done rightly and Christianly. For if it be not so, we have always this excuse to make before God and the world.

From the counterconcilio.

6th This is still at present an unnecessary thing, and would be considered a great defiance, and with other kings and potentates would give rise to all sorts of misgivings, as if one sought thereby cause to excite the people 2c.

007 For such a proclamation is thought to be void, because it is seen that we ourselves are not one; but we must first consider how we may be united among ourselves.

(8) In sum, if a counterconcilium should be good and useful, it is still to be spoken of at the present time as unnecessary).

d. Luthers und seiner Collegen viertes Bedenken?)

Between the 25th and 30th of June 1533.

I also think it best that no further action be taken now than is necessary and prudent, and that no cause be given to the pope or emperor to blame us for misfortune. Do they then, or do they not make a concilium, then day will come and council will also come.

2) This concern is in Luther's handwriting and has the signatures below in the original (Burkhardt, p. 214).

To the exceedingly dear and godly man, Nicolaus Hausmann, the faithful and diligent servant of Christ, his dearest brother in the Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ! I have not had time now, my dear Lord Nicolaus, to write more fully, because of the presence of our most illustrious Prince, before whom I must preach daily, 3) and at the same time negotiate with him about the answer to be given to the envoys of the pope and the emperor, by whom the pope has had some articles sent to us concerning the holding of a concilium, namely, that in this matter action will be taken according to his pleasure and according to the custom of the former conciliums, that is, in which we are to be condemned and burned; but [this the pope says] with slippery words, and words worthy of such a pope. But let us restore to him [such] words as are worthy of him and of us. "Surely there are jacks in the skin, and remain so." They [the envoys] have been treated here 4) very honorably, not for the sake of the pope, but for the sake of the emperor, whose name has been showered with all reverence; but no honor has been shown to the name of the pope. They have not spoken to me, nor to Philip, nor to any among us. For what should a servant of our robber and murderer hear [us] and speak [to us]? More at another time. Now prosper, and pray the Lord for me. On the day after Vitus [16 June] Anno 1533.

4) namely in Wittenberg, where they were welcomed by a deputation of the university.

in GOtt, Wohlgeborner, 1) dear friends, gracious and favorable gentlemen!

2nd After and when you had been with us, the Elector of Saxony, at Weimar, and by command of the most noble, most powerful Prince and Lord, Mr. Carol the Fifth, Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire, our most gracious Lord, and of the Pope Clementis, had solicited us for the sake of a common and general council, namely, because Imperial Majesty and the Pope were talking to each other about it. Majesty and the pope have talked with each other about it, with the handing over of some articles, which you, the papal nuncio, have sent to us there in writings.

(3) To which we gave you this answer at that time: we wanted to talk with the other princes, counts, and imperial cities that are related to us on account of religion, from such advertisements and articles sent to us, in order to give you a unanimous answer. For we would be together at Schmalkalden on Wednesday after St. John the Baptist's Day [June 25], with notice to make our answer known to you by message sent or by means of letters from all of us, and, at your request, to have it put in writing.

4th When we now showed your articles and advertisements to our kinsmen, we all united in this answer.

(5) And first of all we thank the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, in all submissiveness, that Her Majesty (and as we know and have never been able to understand otherwise, except that Her Majesty means it with true Christian faithfulness and heart) has not hesitated to make a gracious provision and promotion to God the Almighty and to the Lord Christ for the praise and honor, and for the pacification and welfare of common Christianity. For we are in no doubt that Imperial Maj. Maj., as the most gracious Lord, is heartily desirous of carrying out such a Council.

(6) We also pray to God that He will further bestow His grace on Her Majesty to promote and direct this most important and most useful cause for all people, so that in it the glory of God may be praised, and all false doctrine, customs, and burdens may be averted, also that consciences may be advised and helped out of doubt, and righteous worship and other Christian virtues may again be established.

1) "Respectable" goes to the imperial orator, "Venerable, well-born" to the Pope's legate, who was bishop and count.

(7) For as we, the Elector of Saxony, have already announced to you at Weimar: We desire for the highest of a council, in which the matters in dispute would be dealt with, judged, and adjudicated in a righteous, orderly, Christian manner and according to the Word of God.

(8) There is no doubt that other nations and peoples, all classes and all Christian minds in all countries, are also eager for such a council. For this is ever unconcealed in the day, that many men's consciences are everywhere burdened with great grievances, which can be healed by no other remedy than in and with such a free concilio.

009 Wherefore, as much as there is in us, we will neither bar nor set ourselves in any way against the intentions, wishes, and heartfelt desires of the other nations, which are continually striving for a free concilio without ceasing, but will gladly promote their Christian mind in all ways possible to us.

010 And are of good hope, where the matters in dispute are righteously and Christianly considered, acted upon, and discerned, that God will grant grace to such Christian conduct, that the truth may be brought to light, and a Christian lasting peace established.

(11) For Her Imperial Majesty has long since put us off such a Council. Her Imperial Majesty has long since promised us such a council, and is more than willing to hold a free, general and Christian council in the German nation at a Diet held by Her Imperial Majesty. 11. For her imperial majesty has long since promised us such a council, and more than at an imperial diet held by her imperial majesty, a free, common, general, and Christian council has been considered, considered, and deliberated upon in a noble and high manner in the German nation, all of which it is highly necessary to report here. For after this division and disunity in religion and faith arose from the preaching of indulgences too brazenly, and several errors and abuses, the correction and rejection of which are highly necessary to all of Christendom, have been contested; although Pope Leo, of the name of the Tenth, has condemned and condemned this doctrine, by which the errors and abuses touched upon have been punished: Nevertheless, because we have always contested such judgments, condemnations, and condemnations, on the basis of the holy, true prophets and apostles' writings and sayings, it was deemed highly necessary to assemble such a council as has been touched upon, in which the matters should be acted upon and heard again; and the words of a farewell are thus: to separate out and retain what is good.

012 And this hath not been our mind and opinion alone, but also of all other churand princes and estates, as then some held imperial congresses bring clear farewells. Because they themselves say and confess that there are a number of errors and abuses in Christendom, which need to be abolished, and realize that the whole world desires a council in which consciences can be helped.

(13) And after the pope condemned this doctrine, this article was actually and expressly weighed in the previous councils of the Reichstags, that a free and Christian, either general or national council should be held in the German nation.

(14) And for this very reason it has been decreed in clear and explicit terms to hold a free and Christian council, so that the papal condemnation and neither the pope's nor any other authority may be detrimental to us. Also, that matters be considered, discerned, and adjudicated not according to papal decrees or school ordinances, which are contested by ours, but according to the holy divine Scriptures, as the most ancient canons and ecclesiastical laws command and decree.

(15) For if the authority of any man should be more valid than the holy divine Scriptures and Christian conscience and knowledge, it is certain that nothing fruitful will be done or accomplished against the pope, not only in these matters of ours, but also in other grievances. For it is known how it has been done in many previous Councils, where reformation has also taken place and been prevented by the pope. And all in all, it has been decided, for clear and excellent reasons, to hold a Christian and free council in the German nation. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has granted.

(16) But Pope Clement's articles, sent to us, the Elector of Saxony, concerning a future council, are not in accordance with the above-mentioned imperial general grants and decrees, which have been described and sealed.

(17) For although in the first article (1) the pope calls it a free concilium, yet in truth he is dealing with something else, since he first of all presumes to take and bind the potentates and princes in such a way that he may have them in his entanglement. For if the pope wanted to have a free council, he would not demand such an obligation, which could not benefit him if something were concluded against him in a free council from God's word and holy Scripture. Because he now

1) Here we have deleted the words: "an article".

If the pope wishes to bind everyone beforehand, he must certainly intend, in the appearance and name of the Council, to exercise and increase his own authority. And the obligation serves him well, so that no one may challenge papal abuses and human ordinances; or if someone wanted to challenge them, that the pope nevertheless incites the others, whom he has under obligation, to oppress him.

018 Now we do not know what the others will do; but this article is, in our opinion, more directed and set to deter all nations from the Concilio, than to induce and bring them to it.

019 For who can in good conscience undertake, while it is still hidden, with what order, manner, and measure the matter is to be handled, and whether the pope, together with his kinsmen and followers, will insist that his authority in the council should be more valid than that of those who have a Christian concern, as has been done before in previous councils?

020 Likewise, whether it be the opinion and mind of the pope to judge and adjudicate the matters in controversy according to the holy scriptures, or according to his authority, or according to the traditions and statutes which have been established and invaded, without any foundation in the divine scriptures?

21 The pope then entangles and binds the liberty of the council in such a way that he allows himself to be heard to proclaim and hold such a council as has been held from time immemorial.

(22) Now we do not reject any of the laws and ordinances that were decreed and established in the old Christian churches according to the Word of God and the Holy Scriptures. But it is undeniable that some of the new churches are not at all like the old ones, because they love papal power and the ordinances of men too highly and make them too great.

023 Therefore it is easy to understand that these words, "according to the custom of the councils," are dangerous, that this council has the liberty which in this matter both princes and estates consider most necessary, and that the matter itself requires it. For the pope wants everything to be done and judged according to his laws and human statutes and his authority, as it is held in the new councils.

(24) In this form there will be neither a free council nor such a council as will serve and promote to give help, consolation, and counsel to the doubtful and afflicted Christian consciences, nor to bring peace to the holy Christian church.

25 Because Pope Clement, Imperial Majesty, has not yet granted the Princes and Estates' petition to the Imperial Majesty to hold a free Christian council, nor has he granted their request. Majesty to hold a Christian free council, nor has she granted their request, and the pope gives so much to note that he does not intend to hold a free council, but as soon as the articles are received, he subordinates himself to strengthen and fortify his power, and to seize and bind the princes:

26 Accordingly, we humbly beseech Your Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, we most humbly request that, in view of the fact that this matter is of the utmost importance, and that in it there is peace for the whole of Christendom and the Church, and all welfare and ruin for the whole nation, you, as the most gracious Emperor, will see to it that such a council is held, so that in it these matters may be righteously and properly discerned, and judged and adjudicated according to God's Word. As then Imperial Majesty Majesty should do, even according to the law, that His Imperial Majesty should be satisfied with this. Majesty to judge and decide matters according to God's word, as often and as strongly as the Pope is opposed to the truth, so that the Pope is not both part and judge.

(27) For all nations are in anticipation of this Council, and they all desire and wish that the doubtful and troubled consciences may at last be advised and helped, and that the most important matters necessary to salvation may be decided. For in many hundreds of years there have not been more important matters discussed than those that have arisen from the abuses and atrocities that have long been committed against the gospel, the grace of God, and the glory of Christ.

028 If then a council should not be held, as has been promised and promised here before, what secret vexations would arise in all pious and Christian hearts, and what troubles of conscience would result therefrom, may easily be considered.

29 Moreover, it is to be feared that if the pope were to flee from righteous and lawful knowledge, which is in accordance with God's word, then Christendom and the church would come to much greater unrest, disunity, and indignation than has hitherto occurred.

030 But we are of comforting hope, our lords and friends, also most gracious and gracious lords, the Christian kings and potentates, and first of all the sovereigns and princes and estates of the German nation, because they have relied on so many things.

They have expressly requested that the sixteenth and seventeenth imperial congresses hold a Christian and free concilium in the German lands, and have made a unanimous agreement that they will not consent to any other concilium, or that they will not allow themselves to be led into such an entanglement of the pope (as he intends and seeks in his articles concerning the future concilium, which he has sent to us, the Elector of Saxony). For this obligation is an unheard-of innovation and full of danger; thus one cannot ever judge and adjudicate these matters righteously if it is not to be done freely and without entanglement or connection.

031 If the pope also would not help the things, then all who commit themselves to the pope would be guilty of it, that henceforth error, abuse, and idolatry would be strengthened and stand for ever.

(32) Therefore, we hereby declare, testify, and condition that we cannot and will not consent to the content of the articles sent by Pope Clement to us, the Elector of Saxony. For we can by no means renounce the true and righteous doctrine of the Gospel by blaspheming the teachings of Christ, even if they are condemned by the pope and his followers and those entangled with them.

033 But if Clement the pope shall hold a council of his will and good pleasure, in which he will judge and make judgments according to his power, let us command the Almighty the things of all Christendom and of the church, and let them be done according to his divine will and good pleasure; which shall keep his righteous and true gospel, according to his promise and promise.

(34) We hereby reserve the right for ourselves and ours, even if the council is to be held in such a convoluted manner as the pope purports to hold it, and if we want it to be imposed on him (as we do not want to provide ourselves with the assurance and assurance that His Imperial Majesty has graciously given us for this purpose). Majesty has graciously given us for this purpose), nevertheless, upon the constant and harmless, unalterable, sufficient assurance and assurance, which we therefore require and will find, that it may be to the praise and glory of God's word to attend such Concilium, or to provide it through ours with a just order, to report and present all our Christian needs, as much as may be deemed convenient by us, everywhere; But with repeated condition, that we in Pope Clement's article, or in such a council, which there is not

According to the imperial treaties 1) made, by no ways want to have consented.

035 If, however, the Council, entrapped and bound by the Pope, should conclude something against God and His holy Word by an unheard innovation, we shall be excused before God and all nations.

(36) For we are not willing to prevent and hinder the council, but ask most diligently and most humbly that ways may be taken that such a free and Christian council may be held, in which consciences may be advised and helped, the glory and honor of our dear Lord and Savior Christ may be praised, and a Christian and lasting peace and unity of Christendom may be established.

(37) For if the pope alone shall deal with it, that he shall strengthen his intemperate power and ungodly opinion and unscriptural worship, by the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious and kind Lord's power, even by the acclamation of kings, princes, and other nations. For if the pope alone should strengthen and fortify his intemperate power and ungodly opinion and unscriptural services by the authority of the Roman Emperor, our most gracious, pious, and kind Lord, and by the applause of kings, princes, and other nations, if he should conclude and judge without a previous righteous, just, and lawful judgment, we do not believe that it will serve the lasting peace and unity of Christendom and the church. Nor will it certainly be good for the pope, if he wants to be a right shepherd, who is obliged to counsel and help the consciences of men, and to entice and encourage the people to righteous godliness and all Christian works.

38) Therefore it is to your respectability and reverence that we kindly, graciously, and obligingly ask you to accept our answer to your advertisement and articles, and to present them to the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, and to the Pope, with the most humble request that their Imperial Majesty, for our Christian, unavoidable need, would not want to receive them from us otherwise than in mercy (as we are then to their Imperial Majesty, the Pope). Maj,

1) "of the Reichsabschiede" put by us instead of: "of the Reichsabschieden".

2) "Conscience" put by us instead of: "certainty".

as our God-ordained authority, our most gracious Lord) understand and note that His Imperial Majesty will act amicably and graciously. Which we again most humbly request to procure such a concilium as the importance and danger of the matter requires, and which we have put off to His Imperial Majesty at so many imperial congresses. Majesty at so many imperial congresses. Namely, that a free and Christian concilium be held in the German nation, in which the matters in dispute are recognized and judged according to God's word by Christian, unsuspecting negotiators.

(39) In this his Majesty God Almighty will do a pleasing work, and will not show to all nations and peoples anything better or more useful, nor more befitting his great power and happiness, than that his Imperial Majesty should use his power and authority for the propagation of our dear Lord Christ's honor, glory and honor, and for the establishment of a lasting peace in all Christendom. Majesty use their power, authority and ability for the spreading of our dear Lord Christ's honor, glory and fame, and to establish a lasting peace of the whole Christendom, 040 And not to strengthen the fury of some, who now many years ago, without any cessation, rage and rage against pious and innocent people, only because of the comforting, only salvific doctrine and preaching of our dear Lord Christ.

(41) So we and our superiors are ready and willing to earn their imperial majesty with our bodies and all our wealth.

42. we also wish to hereby pledge ourselves in all submissiveness to Her Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Maj., as our most gracious Lord, in all submissiveness. Date at Schmalkalden, the last day of June, Anno Domini 1533.

1217: Luther's objections to the letter of Elector John Frederick of Saxony as to whether he should allow himself to be questioned further about the answer given to the Papal Legate two years ago. August 20, 1535.

This misgiving is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 350; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 491; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 129; in the Erlangen, vol. 55, p. 104, and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 622.

Grace and peace and my poor Pater uoster. Most Serene, Most Reverend Prince, Most Gracious Lord! I have received E. C. F. G.'s writing together with the copies from the Concilio and have read it diligently, and because E. C. F. G. graciously requests my reservation as to whether E. C. F. G. should allow himself to be further questioned about the previous answer given two years ago to Imperial Majesty and Pope Clement's legates, it is my humble opinion that everything is sufficiently and Christianly well offered in the same answer. Although, for my own part, I have no interest in the place where it would be in the whole world, because I cannot yet consider it serious, and if they were serious, I would long since have deserved to be smitten and burned by the angry saints. So E. C. F. G., where they would penetrate further, will let themselves be heard. I ask and wish that God would let them become so righteous 1) that they would have to undertake a concilium in earnest, which would have to be called free and Christian. But here I am like the unbelieving Thomas, I must put my hands and fingers into the sides and scars, otherwise I do not believe it; but God can do more than that, in the hands of all men.

1) "zerecht" --- angry. It occurs "zerecht" also Lei De Wette, vol. IV, p. 178: "the black zerecht journeyman" (the devil). De Wette reads there: "Schmerze"; here: "rightly".

I have in my heart. I hereby command E. C. F. G. in the dear Father our God's grace and peace, Amen. Friday in the evening after ALLumlionis Narias s20. AugustP Anno 1535.

1218: Letter of the papal orator Peter Paul Vergerius to the Elector John Frederick of Saxony, in which he asks him for a safe conduct through his country.

Nov. 4, 1535.

The following five numbers are found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 351; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 491; and in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 130. This letter is also found in the 6orp. Hot. vol. II, 962, according to Spalatin's manuscript in the Weimar archives.

Most Serene Prince and Lord! The pope has dispatched me to the princes and estates of the empire on account of the council, and among others to your electoral grace. For he actually believes that your electoral grace is of the mind and will that it would like the dangerous discord in matters of faith to cease and things to come to good agreement and prosper; for which reason I want to depart from Halle tomorrow and come to Wittenberg.

Since I would not meet Your Most Serene Highness there (for the cry goes out that she is not a native), I would first travel to the Elector of Brandenburg, and from there I would deal with Your Highness about the matters on my way back, if perhaps she would come home again at the time I have been ordered to. Therefore I now ask your electoral grace to command yours, as soon as I touch and reach your principality, to give me safe conduct through it, as long as I do my journey in the same. Which your highness does not deny me in my respect.

in view of the fact that, with the approval and protection of both imperial and royal majesty, I am bringing such advertisements and things that are pleasing to God and all pious people, and am coming, as I reported above, the next from there to Hall in Wittenberg. Therefore your most noble lordship may easily judge at which ends this escort shall be procured for me. Given at Hall, on the fourth day of November anno Domini 1535?)

1219. news, how Vergerius arrived Nov. 6th 1535 at Wittenberg and was kept well there by the prince's order, as also of the conversation he had with Luther the next day.

See No. 1218.

(1) On the Sunday after All Saints' Day [Nov. 7], when the papal embassy arrived at Wittenberg the evening before with twenty-one horses and one donkey, and was honestly received by the bailiff, and led into the castle to the inn, Doctor Martinus Luther was summoned to him for a consultation. As soon as Sunday morning Doctor Luther sent for a barber, that he should barber and adorn him. When the barber came, he said, "Mr. D., how is it that you want to be barbered so early? Then D. Luther answered, I am to come to the holy father's, the pope's, message, then I must let myself be adorned, that I seem young, then the legate will think, Oh the devil! is Luther still so young, and has caused so much misfortune, what will he still do? And when Master Heinrich had barbered him, he put on his best clothes, and hung his golden jewel on his neck. Then said the barber, Doctor, this shall offend them. Luther said, "That's why I'm doing it. They have annoyed us more than enough, so one must deal with the snakes and foxes. Then answered the barber, Now, Doctor, go in the peace of God, and the Lord be with you, that ye may convert them. And Luther said, I will not do it: but it may come to pass, that I will read them a good chapter, and let them go.

002 And when Luther had spoken these things, he got into the chariot, and went to the legate to the castle;

1) Spalatin notes that this letter has no signature.

And when he sat in the chariot, he laughed, and said, Behold, the German pope and Cardinal Pomeranus, which are the witnesses and works of God, go by. And he entered into the castle, and was told that he was there. And from that time he was admitted and received, and he received them again; but not so with glorious titles, as papal legates were received in time past.

003 And among other things, when they began to speak of a council, Martin Luther said unto them, It is not your earnestness that ye should hold a council, it is only your mockery; and though ye should hold a council, yet would ye do nothing, but of caps, plates, eating, drinking, and such other foolish things, and for other useless and unnecessary things, since we know beforehand, and are sure that it is nothing. But of faith and justification, and of other things useful and important, how that believers may be of one mind and faith, think ye not once to deal with them; for it is not for you. We are assured of all things by the Holy Ghost, and are not to be conciliated at all, but other poor men oppressed by your tyranny: for ye know not what ye believe. Now therefore, if ye have a mind to do so, make one; I will come, if God will, and if I knew that ye should burn me.

004 Then said the legate, Where, in what city, will ye have the concilium? Luther answered, Where you please, whether it be in Mantua, Padua, or Florence, or whithersoever you please. Then asked the legate, Will ye also have it against Bononia? Lutherus answered, What is Bononia? Then said the legate, The pope's. Luther answered: Almighty God, has the pope also taken this city to himself? yes, I want to come there. Then said the legate: The pope would not refuse to come here to you in Wittenberg. Saith Luther, Well then, let him come hither; we will gladly see him. Then said the legate, How would ye see him? with an army, or without an army? Luther said, As he loved him, we would wait for him both ways. Then the legate asks him, Do you also ordain priests? Lutherus answers: Of course we do, for the pope will not ordain or ordain us. And behold, there sits a bishop whom we have ordained, pointing to Doctor Pomeranum.

005 These and many other things did they speak one to another, which have not all been made known unto me. But in sum, D. Mart. Luther told him everything that was in his heart, and that the need required, without all shyness, fearlessly, with great earnestness.

And when the legate sat upon the horse, and was now about to ride away, he said to Doctor Luther, Vião, ut 8181n8tru6tu8 nä Oonoilium. Ue8ponäU Dut,Ueru8: Veninm, äomine, eum isto 00II0 in so.

1220 Letter of Vergerius from Wittenberg to the Elector John Frederick of Saxony, Nov. 6, 1535, in which he thanks for the kind exception at Wittenberg.

See No. 1218. This letter is also found in Oorp. Ret., vol. II, 964.

Most Serene Prince and Lord! The pope, who sent me to the most noble princes of the German nation in matters concerning the future Concilium, certainly respects that your highness can and may promote this holy trade in many ways. Accordingly, the pope has commanded me to do much with your highness as may be necessary in this matter. But since your Highness is not in her country at present, I have resolved to come to her on the way, when she returns from Austria, and to inform her of many things that I think she will be glad to hear.

For this reason I am writing from Wittenberg, where I have been accepted by your Highness's servants with the highest honors, for which reason I express great thanks to your Highness, asking with all diligence, as soon as this my writing reaches your Highness, that she indicate and inform me which way and through which cities it will take its way back to Saxony, so that I may dispose of it to your Highness and, as mentioned, meet her on the way; And this letter of your electoral grace shall be made and ordered to the most illustrious Duke Georgen of Saxony, for there I will await your Highness' letter. In any case, I cordially entrust myself to your most illustrious sovereignty. Given at Wittenberg, on the sixth day of November, Armo Domini 1535.

1221 Report on what happened and was done between the Elector of Saxony, John Frederick, and the papal orator Vergerius on November 30, 1535, at Prague because of the Concilii.

A. Des Paplichen Orators Vergerius Antragen an den Churfürsten Johann Friedrich, am 30. Nov. 1533.

1st [First the papal orator spoke on this opinion:<sup>1</sup>] because it happened that he did not meet S. C. F. G. in Saxony, but in Bohemia, he wanted to make his advertisement the shorter, because [he heard that the prince was too busy to be delayed long and with many things]. 1) It would now be the dear time, which had long been desired and desired, to hold a Concilium and such a Concilium, which would be Christian, free, common, and pure, before our eyes and hands. For we now have such a pope, such a Roman emperor, and such a king, all of whom have a good mind, will, and heart for concilium. Thus the princes all, with the pope, held nothing higher and more than the promotion of the common good, desired salvation for the whole Christian church, 2) and the honor and glory of Christ our dear Lord. For this reason the pope now sends his messages and sentiments to the rulers, not for a pretense and mirror fencing, as if he were only setting himself up as if he wanted to hold a council, and yet he does not mean it, nor does he have it in mind, but does it only for the purpose of keeping the people in silence, peace, and good obedience; this pope does not think this, as it happened before, that after such a request nothing followed.

(2) This pope, however, would have taken the matter seriously, and would not have dealt with any matter more than with this one; therefore he wanted to take up the matter in the shortest and closest way, as his electors themselves should recognize.

(3) This pope wanted to hold a Christian, free, common, and pure council. And if it were asked of the Malstatt where the council should be held, his answer would be that the pope had decided, for many important reasons, to hold the council at Mantua and nowhere else. Accordingly, the pope exhorted, desired, and asked that his electoral grace, in honor of Christ, would faithfully help to promote the Concilium in question and in the future. If anyone wished to know from him why the pope wanted to hold the council in Mantua and not elsewhere, he would indicate the reason.

(4) Since the place of the future Council has been announced, it would not be necessary to discuss it at length now. For as one can see in the Concilio, gathered together by the Holy Spirit, it would be well to discuss, speak, and act about how, in what form, measure, and manner the concilium should be held.

(5) Hitherto, one has always asked for a common, free, Christian, and pure council, as the printed articles of the Elector of Saxony 2c. and his kinsmen report, which he, the papal orator, also liked. For they would not have wanted to consent to a binding concilium. Well, such a council is now being offered by the pope.

Moreover, neither the pope, nor the emperor, nor the kings, nor the princes would allow anything to be done to them, but would show themselves most friendly to the promotion and execution of the same. Since the Elector of Saxony alone would not consent to such a concilium, it would be considered as if he did not want to suffer either a free or a binding concilium. The previous pope handed down eight articles to hold a council;

(7) This pope, however, does not submit any article at all. About this, this pope would also not have had any articles put forward, neither for himself nor against him; therefore, one has all the less reason to refuse this council. So his Elector sees the future Concilium. He would have asked all princes, and he would also know the minds and opinions of all princes against the Concilium.

(8) The pope would be so highly inclined to hold a concilium that he would certainly give up his own life if he were not to prescribe and hold the concilium; he also believed that the pope's appointment and description of the concilium would come to his attention in the course of time. Therefore his Electoral Grace should now Therefore his electors should now prove their Christian heart and mind, so that they 1) would carry and have to the Lord Christ. For if his Electoral Grace Gn. consent to the Concilium, it would have all the more blissful progress. Since even His Royal Highnesses would oppose it, the Council would nevertheless be upheld; nor would His Royal Highnesses ever be able to atone for it and bring it back. And although his electorate. His Grace would do nothing at the Concilium, nevertheless our dear Lord Jesus Christ would be there and keep it. With the request finally, if his C. F. Gn. wanted to have a report from him, to do the same.

1) "she" put by us instead of "he".

B. Elector Johann Friedrich's answer to this.

His Electoral Grace would have heard and listened to the contents of the orator's request, made by order of the Pope. Now his C. F. Grace's His F. Grace's opinion and mind are once again, as they have always been, that they sincerely desire a common Christian, free and such a council, in which one acts, resolves and judges according to God's Word.

As it has been considered, moved, and decided with great diligence at several imperial congresses, that such a concilium, as touched, should be held in German lands, as then the same imperial congresses have brought resolutions, and the Roman Emperor has graciously granted it. Majesty graciously consented. His Elector. His Grace also did not want (as it is to be considered) to consent otherwise behind the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Empire. What, however, his Electoral. (if it is sufficient) are willing to do for their person, that his Electors have now decided in Vienna against Rome. have now decided in Vienna against the Roman Imperial Majesty, our Allies. Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Since it would also come to a concilio, the high necessity would require that his C. F. Grace would provide their kinsmen and scholars with sufficient assurance and escort. For his C. F. Gn. will, mind, and opinion, as before, that they desired and wish with all their hearts for such a council that would be free, common, and Christian, and in which one would act, conclude, recognize, and judge according to God's Word.

C. The papal orator Vergerius' counter-answer.

To this the papal orator gave this answer: although the princes and estates of the empire had considered at several imperial congresses, and had also resolved to make an effort with imperial majesty that the council should be held in Germany, it would still not have been decided. For otherwise this or some such decree would have been made: "We set, resolve, and decree that the future Council shall be held in Germany. Moreover, the other day he would have had a document from the pope in which he was informed that the Roman imperial majesty had already consented. Majesty had already agreed that the Council should be held nowhere but at Mantua; for the Pope could not have obtained it from the other kings, princes, and potentates that the Council be held anywhere in German lands.

As far as the escort and insurance were concerned, he thought that they did not need any escort at all.

For Mantua would be the Emperor's, and would also be an imperial fief; so Milan would be imperial, as well as the county of Tyrol and other territorial dominions. Therefore they would have nothing at all to fear nor to fear to travel; about which it would be quite inconvenient for the pope to travel to a concilio in Germany. But if he were to travel to Germania, he would have to go with a large army, which would not be convenient for the German nation. However, he takes it for granted that they would easily ask the pope to seek such a thing from the Roman Imperial Majesty. Therefore his request would be to indicate to him in what form, measure, and manner the escort and the assurance should be provided and made.

D. The Elector John Frederick's Answer to the foregoing Replica.

1. Gn. graciously request, since such things and business have happened to them that they could not hear him further in person, that he would like to have his Electoral Grace excused. His Elector's Grace to be pardoned.

(2) Furthermore, it would not be within the power of his C. F.G. to have the place of the Concilii set elsewhere, against and contrary to the preceding several imperial congresses, without the knowledge of the other princes, princes, and estates of the realm, (1) likewise without the knowledge of their kinsmen in the matter of religion; for what his electorate has done in the matter of religion, it would not be within the power of his C. F.G. to have the place of the Concilii set elsewhere without the knowledge of the other princes, princes, and estates of the realm. Gn. Person, they had already reported to the King's Majesty themselves.

(3) In addition, as previously reported, great necessity would require that their relatives and scholars be provided with sufficient assurance for a future council, for one would well know what had been done to the people in several councils before. Therefore, one would not only have to have a written escort and assurance, but also guarantees and scourges.

(4) The papal orator then let himself be heard to say that he alone should be told what form and measure he wanted to be assured of for the Council, and he would order and arrange it for the best; with an attached diligent request that he therefore address my most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, only three more words, and give his hand to S. C. F. G., who alone should be Magister Franciscus Vinariensis, for he had something secret to report to S. C. F. G., which he wanted to do as quickly as possible. C. F. G.'s hand, whereby only Magister Franciscus Vinariensis should be, for he would have something secret to report to S. C. F. G., which he wants to do as quickly as possible, and His Lordship cannot endure.

1) So put by us instead of: "to lay up".

5th When now my most gracious lord come again to the papal orator, the orator has said harmless thus, beside and in hearing NnZiskri ^rurioisei Vinariensis:

(6) What he now wants to report to S. C. F. G., he would like to do secretly, not only for the sake of S. C. F. G.'s counsel, but also for the sake of those whom he now has with and beside him.

(7) He had received a document from the pope in which it was indicated that the king of France, who had previously urged that the council be held, 2) had also consented to do so in Mantua. Since such a mighty king would have liked the pope's concern about the place of the future council, it is to be hoped that things would proceed more correctly and more Christianly everywhere, before the king of France brings so many prelates 2c. with him to his kingdom.

(8) Thus the Roman Imperial Majesty wrote to the Pope that they were at one with him for the sake of the Council. Majesty had also written to the pope that they were at one with him in the matter of the Council, where he could also request this from the princes and other princes of the German nation. As he had already received such from all of them; he also knew their minds and opinions, with the exception of S. C. F. Gn. The Roman Imperial and Royal Majesties had also declared themselves against the Pope. Majesty had shown all paternal confidence in the pope to hold a concilium, and had placed this entire order in the pope's good pleasure.

(9) Thirdly, the orator S. C. F. G. did not want to conceal that he had been to Wittenberg, and there had been honestly, well, and kindly accepted and kept by the bailiff, for which he thanked His Lordship most diligently. Now he would have asked Doctor Martin Luther there to come to him for supper, and would have talked with him in all sorts of ways, who would have answered him thus: I take it for granted that a common, free, and Christian council, such as the pope proposes, would be highly necessary; I also desire, and wish for this most, not for the sake of ours, who by the grace of God have no need of a council at all. For we already have the pure and unadulterated Word of God, and the wholesome, healthy doctrine, even such churches in which the ceremonies are directed, provided, and appointed according to the Word of God; but on account of the foreign and alien nations, so that this our doctrine may also come to them in this form. Since Luther had said this, he, the orator, could not have refrained, as he had not been told.

Savoy.

If he had wanted to remain silent on the way, he would have said to Luther: "Martin Luther, dear man, what are you saying now? see to it that you do not think too much of yourself, for you are a human being and can err. Do you then want to be wiser, wiser, more learned, and more holy than so many councils and holy fathers, so many also highly learned people, distributed throughout the whole world, who also faithfully confess Christ's name and faith?"

(10) And truly, said the papal orator, most noble prince, your electoral grace will consider this matter well, and will not rely and trust so much in one man, however highly learned he may be, which it is not fitting for me to judge, for he may err and be deceived. Do not doubt, your electoral grace will consider and regard this as the Christian, highly understanding Elector, and who means it best with the holy Christian faith and the whole Christian church peace and unity; which I can by no means hold against your electoral grace, as he means it faithfully with her, that I have held such a conversation and discussion with Luther. In the end, I command myself to your churf. gn. And after having been for some time in the presence of the Roman Imperial Maj. Maj. as the Pabst's skillful man, and will henceforth perhaps be with you longer: so I offer my willing services, not so much for the sake of your churf. Maj. than for her servant, whom I am always willing and able to serve and please.

(11) To this our most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, had this answer given: First, that his Electoral Grace would gladly have heard his report. Grace would have been pleased to hear his report to both Imperial and Royal Majesties, and to the King of France's opinion and mind of the Council. His Electoral Grace also did not want to leave any doubt that the Roman Emperor and the Royal Majesty would show themselves graciously towards the whole Roman Empire and before the German nation, and that they would not easily deviate from the opinion that had been thought of and decided upon at several imperial congresses, and that had been graciously agreed upon by the Imperial and Royal Majesty, and that they would not easily deviate from pleasing the Pope without great, necessary and urgent causes.

(12) That he had also been well and honestly received and kept at Wittenberg, that his electoral grace was also well pleased. Grace also well pleased.

(13) That he, the orator, had also talked and disputed with Doctor Martin Luther about the Concilio, pleased his electoral grace well, grace, and thought it well that Doctor Martini

Luther's concern and opinion would be right, good and honest. And although His Electoral Grace and the other princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire Grace and the other princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, related to it 1) for the sake of religion, have never been shy, and have not yet been shy before the knowledge and judgment, from and according to God's Word and the Holy Scriptures, about the doctrine to which we profess, in matters concerning religion and holy Christian faith; as then from the answer, so his Electoral Grace and their kinsmen before both, Roman Imperial Majesty, have given to Luther. Grace and their kinsmen, both of the Roman Emperor's Majesty, and the Pope's orators and deputies, are evidently and obviously sufficient, and are also again required to show the causes of their faith to all those who should have it. Likewise, if the Elector's grace were still most desirable Grace would still be most eager for a free common council, 2c. as the papal orator, the day before, had passed, and now indicated. So it is his electoral grace that a council is to be held. grace that a council would not be so necessary and useful for our sake as for the sake of the foreign nations, so that the holy gospel and the comforting word of God's grace might arise in this form and be spread as widely as possible among those who have hitherto kept it hidden. For our doctrine, by the grace of God, does not need much correction, justification, knowledge, and judgment by the Council, for it would not be based on human delusion and wisdom (which could and might err and be lacking), but on the hard, strong, and solid rock of God's Word, which remains forever, and which even the gates of hell and their power would never be able to overcome.

Finally, his electoral grace would also graciously accept the papal orator's offer. His electoral grace would also be willing to graciously accept the papal orator's offer; his electoral grace would also be willing and willing to recognize it in turn.

1222 The opinion of the papal orator Vergerius, which he has sent in writing to the Elector John Frederick at his request. December 1, 1535.

See No. 1218. Latin also in the 6orp. Rsk. This German translation is in the Weimar Archives in Spalatin's manuscript.

Most Serene Prince and Lord! Here I want to present the articles concerning the Concilium, which I have offered Your Electoral Grace in my own person. Grace in my own person.

1) "their"                      put                      by                      us                      instead                      of:                      "in".

also put in a writing: considered that your electoral grace desires such from me. Grace desires such from me, although it is entirely unnecessary. For my advertisement is pure and brief, and not overwhelmed with any articles; so faithfully does Pope Paul, of the name of the third, mean it, and so eager is he to raise up again the faith in Jesus Christ.

(2) Therefore I have said that his holiness has entirely decided to reject and prevent a common general council, the division in our faith, and the danger and trouble which have now long been before our eyes in the future. In doing so, I have made many statements, and introduced what a special, faithful, consistent, conscientious, and wise man the pope is, so that everyone may note from them that he will do and carry out everything he now undertakes to do in the most honest and faithful manner.

(3) That the pope will also consider that the city of Mantua, for 1) many reasons, will be most convenient for the Concilio, that he will also describe the Concilium shortly.

4. He also said that he did not want to send an article either to the noble German princes or to the princes of other nations, as had been done in this matter before, but that he thought it would be much more convenient to discuss how a council should be held in an orderly and righteous manner when the council, assembled in the Holy Spirit according to the Pope's description and request, had already met; for now it is discussed that a council should be described, appointed, and held.

5th Also that his holiness soon in the beginning of his papacy sent and delivered messages and orators to all Christian princes, also above to the most noble Roman, to Hungary and Bohemia king, and all of the holy Roman realm princes and other princes and states, which I already touched to advertise to them.

(6) Moreover, if the pope had had the right and the power to command and to create all this, so that it was out of his power to keep it in this matter (which has always been entirely granted to the papacy, and would be so again), and had not been allowed to declare his mind, will, and opinion now by an orator of his own, he would still have been able to do so with all of them, and before with the glorious German nation, whom he loves with all his heart. Therefore, when they hear such a request and description of the Concilii, which is directed to the expansion and greater spread of the faith and glory of Jesus Christ, they will gladly and unanimously dispose of themselves in the city of Mantua.

1) "from" put by us instead of: "without".

(7) And if I should find and request anyone who would perhaps oppose and oppose for reasons, that I should indicate the same reasons why the council should not be held elsewhere than in Mantua, or in another city in Italia, and before also those in German lands, as some desire; which reasons of his electoral grace I have also verbally reported, and now it is unnecessary to repeat.

(8) Besides, I have reported that I have traveled with such orders and advertisements to the most noble Roman 2c. king, then to all the princes of the Roman empire; then also with such advertisements and orders to your electoral grace that also his royal majesty has come. King, then to all the Electors of the Roman Empire; then also with such an advertisement and order to your Electoral Grace, that his Royal Majesty, as the Christian, God-fearing King, would do the best in this matter of his hope everywhere, likewise also the other German Princes with whom I have been; although at that time I was not able to report what the answer would have been from each of them.

(9) Of the Most Serene Lord, because in the answer first given to me the occasion required it, I have expressly and clearly said to those of the others; namely, that His Imperial and Christian Majesty, as much as I have noted from the Pope's writing, had already consented to hold a concilium at Mantua, which would be no news at all. For the Emperor's Maj. Majesty also did this three years ago, in addition to the papal orator, through her own orator and dexter, and in this opened his mind and opinion, and indicated that the Emperor, as a constant and before Christian Emperor, would have no reason at all that he should now be of a different mind in this matter than he was before, indeed, there would be many reasons why he would be of this opinion and mind now, when he was never of this mind before.

010 Especially, however, because of so many and ugly Sacramentans, Anabaptists, and other sects, which have unholy taken possession of the hearts of many German peoples, from whose raging and fury it would be difficult to save and manage a few assemblies of foreign, pious men of integrity, who would come to the concilio unarmed, to condemn their ineptitude and ungodliness; for it would seem to be a good thing to do so.

Everybody sees that several of them are quite mad and nonsensical.

(11) About this I have also said that your electoral graces would do Christianly and praiseworthy if they consented to such a thing; indeed, your electoral graces could not well do otherwise than consent to it. For after your electoral graces had previously received several articles from Pope Clement the Seventh, they answered that they were most eager for a pure and unadulterated council.

(12) Your electoral graces, however, would complain that a concilium should be held with such articles attached as would easily unite and entangle the princes. For your kinsmen have thus interpreted the same, which answer now every man now and then carries about. But now, I say, you abstain from holding a 1) pure, unadulterated, and without all articles concilium. Therefore, if your electoral graces did not want to consent to it now, they would give the whole world to understand that they did not want to submit to the concilii's judgment and decision, in view of the fact that your electoral graces did not want to consent to a concilium with articles before, nor to a concilium without all articles now.

013 I have also said that those who hoped for such a dishonest bargain would have a vain hope that the pope would send about some articles, not only before the judgment and sentence, but also before the appointment of a council, neither himself nor the papal see, and in matters which have now long been confirmed and confirmed by permanent causes. That even you many more would have this vain hope, who hoped that the most noble Roman Emperor Carl, of the name of the Fifth, as the most vigorous protector and handler of the Christian faith, against the Pope's will, or even without his consent, would describe and appoint a concilium for you in German lands (as of you much publicly that you thus desire).

Fourteenthly, I have also provided that a conducive council may also be with more fruit and benefit, as well as with your great praise and glory, if your Serenity, summoned before the call, were to ripen in Mantua. The pope has also asked you to do this out of paternal benevolence, for the promotion of the common peace of all Christendom.

1) "one" put by us instead of: "one".

(15) But if your Lordships should refuse to come to the Council (as might happen), his greatness would not fail to do such a holy work. (as might happen) would refuse to come to the Concilio, his great power would by no means refrain from such a holy work, and the pope would then rely on the help of our Lord Jesus Christ, whose affairs the pope is in charge of, and also on the approval and help and applause of those whom he knew would stand and hold steadfastly with him in carrying out such a holy work.

(16) These are all the articles which I have spoken. And since your Lordships have promised to send me an answer when they have dealt with their fellow relatives in the matters of religion and God's word, of this whole matter, therefore my request is to do this in the most beneficial way possible, and to make me a touched answer to the Roman Royal Majesty, by which I will therefore remain.

(17) After Your Electoral Grace had also asked me in this matter from whom and what kind of escort and assurance they should have. Your Grace, in this action, asked me from whom and what kind of escort and assurance they should have, since they would be traveling in Italy? and thereby avoiding that they would perhaps not only desire a written escort and assurance, but also to confirm it with scourges, I will also add the answer I have given to this article: For if the Concilium were to be in Mantua, because it is a fief of the Holy Roman Empire and lies on the border of the German Nation (since the nearest cities in Italy are either of the Lord Emperor or of the dominion of Venice, which would hold fast to justice and faith and would also be friendly to the Lord Emperor), then there would be no danger or trouble at all in Mantua. Therefore one would not need any insurance. But if someone should ask for escort and assurance, the Imperial Majesty would give them. Moreover, as far as he is concerned, the pope would not refuse to give the usual and necessary insurance, which he would like to give out of his power and authority.

(18) May the merciful God alone have so much mercy that your princely grace heartily desires a conciliar, as we are to provide for ourselves from many causes; for this matter will soon be settled, and the assurance shall not fail to do so. Given at Prague, on the 1st day of December, in the year of our Lord 1535.

Petrus Paulus Vergerius, Pabst's Paul the Third Orator.

1223 The protesting state's joint answer at the convention in Schmalkalden, which was sent to the papal orator Vergerius. December 21, 1535.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 357; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 506; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 137, and in Hortleder, tom. I, lib. I, 6np. 20, p. 87; Latin in the Corp. Lei. vol. II, 1018.

1. our greeting. The most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Duke John Frederick of Saxony, our cousin, friend and most gracious Lord, has told us what you reported to him at Prague, where you met him; He has also sent us your handwritten document, in which you report that the pope is being summoned to hold a council, but that the council is to be appointed in Italy, and that it has not yet been determined what the form and order of the council should be, and that this belongs entirely to papal authority.

002 Although not all of those who have come here have had orders from the Council, for in this hurry no notice of your advertisement may have been given to them, we, those described below, have nevertheless thought to answer you.

(3) And although an ample answer would have been necessary, for you have thus reported the Concilio, that you have also reported some articles, of which we justly complain from our and common Christianity's point of view; nevertheless, since you most opportunely desire an answer, we have wanted to give you our opinion briefly and clearly.

(4) And first of all, we have often declared our opinion of the Council in the Imperial Diet, and in the answer we gave two years ago to the Imperial and Papal Orators. For we too, for the good of common Christianity and betterment, heartily desire a Christian, free Concilium, which we and other princes and estates in the Empire have requested of Imperial Majesty. Majesty, as they have also considered that such a council would be necessary.

(5) We also do not doubt that all God-fearing people desire and wish for such a council that will one day help Christendom. For it grieves godly people greatly that with such unrighteous cruelty in many countries right doctrine and usefulness to the church are suppressed, the members of Christ are horribly torn apart, and ungodly abuses are confirmed.

006 This cruelty is not at all of those who are to govern the church; for it will be an everlasting destruction and desolation of the church.

where such does not occur through a Christian concilium.

(7) Therefore, if a council has ever been necessary in churches, it is now necessary to change the old abuses, and to prevent unjust cruelty, and in the future to provide salvation and welfare for Christendom in a right way.

(8) For this reason, we do not want to let ourselves be lacking, but gladly promote the common good; and with all our will, we ask to appear in this free and Christian council, which is necessary, as it is often decided in the imperial congresses; and we ask God to grant such a Christian council, which serves the glory of Christ and the salvation of the church.

(9) But as for the meeting of which you have announced that the pope will appoint Mantuam, we have no doubt that your imperial majesty will graciously comply with the previous decrees of the Imperial Diet and with the resolution that such a council be held in German lands. Your Majesty will graciously comply with the previous resolutions of the Imperial Diet and with the request that such a council be held in the German lands.

10th For that it is reported to the Elector that it should be unsafe in German lands, and that for that reason one should not be allowed to speak freely, we hold against it that for this very reason a court should be appointed in the German land, so that these things may be heard rightly and properly, and that one may speak freely, so that the interrogation is not prevented by parties and force, and pious people are not deterred in speaking to judge rightly and freely.

What danger can there be in German lands, since all princes, cities, and towns are subject and faithfully obedient to the emperor? In addition, there is a quite praiseworthy regiment in the cities, since protection and protection is honestly given to foreigners.

012 Ye also report that the pope alone will give a common escort, and that he may receive for his person; how we are to understand this, we have misgivings from the foregoing Conciliar History.

(13) Further, Christianity needs a common, free, Christian council, and to such we have appealed.

014 But ye report not to speak or act of the form and order of interrogation, and let it be heard that this belongs wholly to papal authority to draw; that is, not to consent to a free concilium.

015 Two years ago a concilium was promised, but with some articles dangerously attached; now the most important, namely, of the liberty of the Concilii, that is, of the form and order of the interrogation, partly dangerously concealed, partly placed on the pope. For you say, then, that to promote and to hold concilii belongs solely to papal authority. 1)

016 Now that the pope hath so often condemned our cause, he is publicly our adversary. But where the adversaries are to be judges, there can be no free or lawful concilium.

017 And therefore a free council is sought and promised, that is, in which, by universal suffrage, the emperor, kings, potentates, princes, and estates shall be chosen from all estates, competent, impartial men to hear and decide these matters according to the word of God.

018 For conciliation is not to be the judgment of popes only, but also of other people and estates in the church and in the holy scriptures; as is evident from the examples of the ancient churches, wherein it is seen that in conciliation the Christian princes, and other Christian honourable men, are brought in for trial. And it is sacrilege and tyranny to exert the Pope's power over the whole church.

(19) For this reason the authority of the emperor, kings, potentates, princes, and estates, as well as of pious, Christian, and honorable men, is to be exercised in councils, and competent men are to be chosen for interrogation, especially in such matters (as papal laws also regulate) in which the vices and errors of the popes are challenged, namely, unrighteous worship and false doctrine.

020 These things are especially common, and concern all Christendom, and in them kings and princes are bound to provide that a lawful hearing be held; as many other bishops are condemned for their errors by their churches, and some popes by the emperors and the church.

021 Now it is public that great things are in dispute, of unrighteous doctrine and unrighteous worship, which the pope administers not only with doctrine, but also with cruel commandments; wherefore great cruelty is exercised in obedience to him, upon those who do not commend such abuses.

022 Therefore it is clear that the pope is our part and our antitype, and that in this case it is necessary that the church, emperors, kings, princes, and estates have understanding, and decree the interrogation.

23 For this reason we ask once again, as before, for a free council, that is, in which competent, impartial people are elected from all the estates to decide these important matters, which are necessary to the consciences, according to God's word.

1) No. 1222, § 6.-

24 What can one seek that is cheaper? And this form of interrogation is according to the Gospel and the Church's previous examples.

025 When we perceive that by this lawful way, and not tyrannically, the things are to be done, nothing shall be done to us; and we hope that in such interrogation, by the grace of God, the truth may come to light, and the glory of Christ be extolled, and peace and unity of the church be restored.

026 But if there be not a common and free council, as aforesaid, we have here testified, that we desire that which is lawful and generally profitable to Christendom, and also manly desirable in all countries.

27 For it is to be considered, where these things are not heard rightly and properly, as reported above, according to God's word, that it is to be feared that there might be greater disruption and unrest in the church.

028 But as much as there is in us, let there be no lack in us to promote the common good, peace, and unity.

029 And as we cannot forsake the doctrine which pertains to the glory of God, (for Christ saith [Matt. 10:32], Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my heavenly Father:) so in other things let us show moderation and forbearance, that it may be known that we greatly desire common unity. At your request, we do not wish to restrain you on account of ourselves and the common church. Date at Schmalkalden, December 21, 1535.

By the Grace of God Johann Friedrich, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c.

Franciscus, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg.

Philip, Landgrave of Hesse.

1224 Pope Paul the Third's Bull, with which he has advertised the Concilium and appointed it to Mantua, June 2, 1536.

This writing, together with the following, is found in the Wittenberg edition (1553), vol. IV, p. 427b; in the Eisleben, vol. II, p. 388; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 1054, and in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 143. Also in Hortleder, 1. e. pp. 91 and 96. This bull is in Latin in Lünig's speiüb eoel. pari. I, p. 442.

Paul, bishop, a servant of the servants of God, for future remembrance.

1. Having been required by divine providence and providence to care for and govern the Christian army, we have desired nothing more from our hearts, nor have we asked more diligently of God Almighty, than that we might cleanse His Christian church, which He has commanded us, of so many harmful heresies and errors, which have now long since arisen and grown up in it, through the grace and action of the Holy Spirit and through our diligent understanding, that we may see it cleansed, reformed and improved in good morals, restored to its proper state and righteous character, serving God in holiness and righteousness.

002 Moreover this care is not less incumbent upon us, that we perceive, and also see before our eyes, that the Christian congregation, both inwardly, by the antagonism and warfare of Christians one with another, and outwardly, by the persecution and wicked wiles of unbelievers, is troubled, daily rent asunder, and weakened.

(3) Because we, out of Christian concern, as befits a shepherd, would gladly meet such evil with timely counsel and help, and for this reason have diligently considered and considered many and various ways and means, we have found none better nor more convenient than this, which the holy people, our forefathers, and indeed the common Christian church itself, have tried and found to be the most salutary in such serious matters, namely, to assemble and hold a common council.

4. Accordingly, since we have stepped into the footsteps of these saints, and since we have fully considered and intended to hold such a council (which we also highly desired before, when we were still in a lesser state) so soon in the beginning of our papacy, we have not only had such a council publicly heard, but also given it to our beloved sons, Carolo and the Roman Emperor, and to other Christian emperors, we have not only let our constant mind and will be heard and heard publicly, but have also made it known to our beloved sons, Carolo, the Roman Emperor, and other Christian kings and princes by letters and messages; Now, however, to publicly proclaim such a council (by means of divine help), and subsequently to hold it at a certain time and place, as will be reported hereafter, and to bring it to a good end, finally resolved.

005 And are confident and hopeful, with the help of God, that by such a holy and wholesome remedy, not only will all heresy and error be rooted out of the Lord's field, and the morals of the Christian community improved, but also To make a common peace and unity among the believers in Christ, and by a common military campaign under the banner of the holy cross, against the unbelievers, to conquer again our kingdom and lands which are taken by them; also to make the poor captive people, which are innumerable, free and delivered again, and to convert the unbelievers to our holy Christian faith (by divine grace). So that the whole world, brought together into one flock or sheepfold of the Lord, may live in right faith, hope and love, chastely, righteously and godly, and then wait to receive the crown of righteousness from God Almighty.

6. Therefore, if we have resolved to hold a common council for the praise and glory of God, and for the salvation, welfare and improvement of His Church, and if we intend to comply with it in our confirmed and constant mind, we proclaim, appoint, command, establish and order in the name of the holy, indivisible Trinity, the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, by the authority and power of God Almighty, and the holy apostles Peter and Paul, whom we have on earth, and by the advice and consent of the venerable Cardinals of our brethren of the holy Roman Church, do ordain an OserirnsniLurn, universal, common Concilium in the city of Mantua (which is a safe, comfortable, fertile place, full of good houses and dwellings), in the year to be counted 1537, on the 23rd day of the month of May. It is to be held on the 23rd day of the month of May, which is the Wednesday after the holy day of Pentecost, and to be concluded and completed by God's help.

- 007 And hereupon command all and every one, the venerable, our dear brethren, patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, and our beloved sons, abbots, and others, of all the churches and monasteries, prelates, where they are in the world, by virtue of their oath taken, and of holy obedience, and under penalty and penalties imposed by law or custom, or otherwise on those who will not come to common council, to appear therein in person.

008 But to the above-mentioned Roman emperors, kings, dukes, princes, margraves, and others, to whom it is due by right or custom to be in such council, we exhort by the heartfelt love of the Lord JEsu Christ, that for the sake of peace and unity, welfare and improvement of the Church of God, they may also personally, which we most desire, or else, if they cannot personally, by stately and honest messages, at a convenient time, take this holy council.

lium, so shall be held in the city of Mantua (as reported above), shall attend.

009 Which, if they shall consider how pleasant and agreeable it will be to us and to all Christendom that they should be present in person at the aforesaid Council, we have no doubt that both of them, and all the other kings and princes above named, and especially Carolus, the Roman Emperor, and Franciscus, the most Christian King of France, will then appear therein in person.

(10) For the said Emperor Carolus, out of special earnestness and love for our holy faith, both in his name, and on account of his brother, the most illustrious Roman King Ferdinandi, also the princes, and other princes and estates of the holy Roman Empire, have often vehemently and earnestly requested a common council from our ancestor (of blessed memory), Pope Clement the Seventh.

11. After, however, due to various incidents, swift, heavy trades and wars, and for other important reasons, especially due to the above-mentioned Pope Clement's fatal departure, this holy work and completely inclined Christian mind, which our forefather carried to it, was prevented from continuing and remained, If the above-mentioned Pope Clement's deathly departure prevented this holy work, which our forefather carried to it, from continuing and remained, then we have to write out and keep our advice and concerns about the above-mentioned Council soon in the beginning of our upcoming papacy (as reported above), and then to give it to the above-mentioned of our brothers, the Holy Roman Church Cardinals. Roman Church Cardinals, in their common assembly decided and declared sentence, to the said Emperor Carolo; of which he, as our dear son, as befits, has thanked us most sincerely.

(12) Thus we have also received from the above-mentioned King Francisco, after he had also previously sent an entirely Christian writing to our much-mentioned ancestor, Pope Clement, and to the holy gathering of the Cardinals, as we have then provided ourselves to the most Christian king, an answer which is conformable and in accordance with our mind (concerning the Concilium).

013 Nevertheless we beseech and exhort the same Roman emperors, kings, princes, and others who have been notified, to use all possible diligence and earnestness, and to procure that all and every person who has been seated in their kingdoms, lands, and territories, and who by right or custom is required to be present at the common councils, may go and come thither in person. Or, if they are married and have a disability, which they are to be credibly obliged to indicate that they are then to be provided with sufficient authority through suitable embassies, commanders, and orators to attend the council and to remain in the city of Mantua until the end of the council. So that through such a stately assembly of the faithful in Christ, what is conducive to God's praise, reformation and improvement of the morals in the church, and the same elevation, and complete eradication of heresy, and all the faithful in Christ's harmony and welfare, also conducive and conducive to a common campaign against the unbelievers, may be salutary and blessedly decreed in the same Concilium, by divine grace and help.

014 Moreover, in order that all and every thing which has been enumerated may be known to those whom it concerns, and that no one may plead that he has had no knowledge of it, nor that he has good reason to excuse himself (since also this writing would not be safe and without danger to some persons who are here understood to be personally and particularly notified and delivered), we desire and command that these present letters be publicly read by some of our court messengers, or public notaries, in the high church of the chief apostle St. Peter in the city of Rome, and in the church of Lateranensi (where the people are in the habit of hearing the divine office). Peter in the city of Rome, and in the church of Lateranensi (where the people frequently gather to hear the divine office), be publicly read and proclaimed in a loud and audible voice, and thereafter the copies of such letters shall be posted at the two churches now mentioned, and also at the papal gates and doors, and also at the front of the campoflor, and there remain affixed for some time.

15. We also will, when this letter is so posted, that all and every one whom it concerns, of what standing or dignity they are, after the expiration of two months (from the day on which it was proclaimed and posted), shall accept the same everywhere in like manner, and be bound thereby, and also give the same perfect undoubted credence, as if this letter or the copy thereof had been executed or signed by an open scribe's hand, and possibly sealed with an ecclesiastical prelate's seal, delivered and delivered to them personally.

016 Therefore let no man by any means be permitted to violate this letter of ours, our proclamation, calling, commandment, writ, order, summons, exhortation, and petition, will, and decree, or to live contrary to the same with unholy thirst.

017 But if any man shall presume to do so, who shall know that he shall fall into grievous disgrace of God Almighty, and into the holy apostles of Peter and Paul.

Given in Rome at St. Peter's, after the birth of the Lord in the year 1536, on the other day of the month of June, and of our Papacy in the other year.

1) "Ghinuciis" put by us instead of: "Chinuciis" in the editions. This Jerome is the Bishop of Ascoli, whom we have already met in the 15th volume of our edition, Col. 544, § 1; he was Auditor General of the Pope.

In the year following the birth of the Lord 1536, indiot1oQ6 noia,2) on the holy Sunday of Pentecost, the fourth day of the month of Junei, of the Pabst of the Most Holy Father in Christ, and of our Lord Paul, by the divine providence of the Third, in the other year,

I, John Doliatoris, the court messenger of our most holy father, the pope, have read the papal letters, proclamation, call, command, writ, order, command, summons, exhortation, petition, will and decision of the common council, which is to be held in Mantua, according to the same letters, in the church of St. John Lateranensis and in the cathedral of St. Peter in the city of Rome. The order, the request, and the decision of the common council, to be held in Mantua, according to these letters, in the church of St. John Lateranensis, and in the cathedral of St. Peter in the city of Rome, while masses and other divine offices were being held there, and a large crowd of people were present, and they were read word for word in a loud, audible voice before all the people who were present, as was proper.

Likewise I, John, and beside me Peter Serrano and Peter Gomez, also the court messengers of our most holy father the pope, have posted the above-mentioned papal letters, after they have been publicly read and proclaimed, at the above-mentioned church gate, and thus left them posted at every church gate for an hour and more, and have also left the same copies there, removed against their originals (as is customary).

On the same day the above-mentioned, I Johannes Doliatoris, court messenger, and Petrus Gomez, have posted the same papal letters, after they had been publicly read and proclaimed, on the gates or doors of the papal chancery, and in front on the campoflor at the time of vespers, and have also left them pinned up in any place for an hour or more, which copy, as above, has been collated with the original (as is usual).

So it's.

Thomas Roger, chief court messenger.

1225 Pope Paul III's bull for the reformation of the city and court of Rome, which he ordered a committee of cardinals and bishops to do. Sept. 23, 1536.

2) In the Wittenberg wrong: "noua".

Paul, bishop, a servant of the servants of God, for future remembrance.

(1) The most high God therefore caused his only begotten Son to take on our flesh, and also united divine and human nature in one person, that in virtue of such ineffable union not only the fall of Ade might be restored, but that also his holy church might be promoted thereby, and that the same members might be joined together by a very firm bond of love, and that the Christian people might attain peace in unity, salvation in the power of the Spirit, and eternal glory in a firm bond of love. For this reason we (to whom the merciful, though unworthy, in his stead on earth, out of mild kindness, commanded the care and government of his church) have wished to execute such a command usefully and blessedly, and to help that this church, which is one body of Christ, may duly serve its Head, our Beatificator; as we then desire that it may be sanctified and cleansed from all stain.

(2) For this reason, out of very urgent concerns, moving causes of great importance, concerning the present state of the church and of the apostolic see at Rome, and the complete eradication of the poisonous, pestilential Lutheran heresy, and other heresies, we have resolved to proclaim and hold a concilium. And for this cause we have sent our own noble embassy to the Christian kings, princes, and potentates.

3. But since such a grave matter cannot soon be brought to an end, in the meantime, while we are engaged in this business, we have also undertaken to reform the holy city of Rome (which is the head and chief of all Christendom, from which all other Christians are to learn good manners and godly good conduct), and to sweep the court of Rome, and the officers thereof, from all abuses, from all vices, and from evil shameful habits; That therefore, when our own house is cleansed, we may the more easily sweep and purge the others, and order and arrange all that is therein for the glory and praise of them.

(4) But since human nature is frail and imperfect, so that we ourselves are not able to carry out this important matter which is incumbent upon us, and at the same time other matters and affairs in the city and court of Rome, we have appointed some of our brethren, Cardinals, whom the most high God has ordained to us as assistants in our care and office, to carry out such necessary matters.

and salutary works and burdens beside us. For this reason we have appointed the venerable, our dear brother John, bishop of Ostia, Sene, and our beloved sons, Antonium, priest-cardinal of St. Mary, beyond the Tiber, de St. Severino, and Hieronymum, priest-cardinal of St. Balbinä, de Ghinutiis, and Jacobum, priest-cardinal of St. Cyriaci in DUsrniis Liinonstain, also Paulum, DiaconCardinal St. Eustachii (all of whom are Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church), and to whom the worthy, our dear brethren, Christophorum Cassaneum, Nicolaum Nuivoticum, and Petrum Aquensem, all three bishops, residing in the Court of Rome, having been ordered and set as reformers of the city and Court of Rome by our apostolic power and command, order and set the same in virtue of this Bull. We also hereby give the above-named and the greater part of them free, full authority and power to reform, change, and improve all things and all things in particular that they find necessary in the reported court of Rome, both in spiritual and secular matters, and to order, provide, and decree everything that will be useful, necessary, and convenient for this office and matters. They also hereby give them further power and authority, in everything which they shall order or reform, to punish the objectors, by banishment and excommunication, lotas ssn-tsntias, by stunting, withholding of the yearly pensions and interest, by the payment of the annual taxes. The kingdom shall have the power to compel those who oppose it to obey the law, by the ban and excommunication, lotas ssn-tsntias, by stunting, withholding of annual pensions and interest, by deprivation and deprivation of their ecclesiastical offices and fiefs, or other penalties and punishments, and to keep those who oppose it in obedience by all other penalties, penalties, and ways of law, and to call upon secular aid and draokinin ssonlars over the same, if it were necessary.

(5) And hereby command all and any persons, especially those who abstain in Rome, of whatever dignity, rank, degree, order, or nature they may be, ecclesiastical or secular, that they shall be obedient and obedient to the reported Reformatibus in all and any matters, especially those which they shall create and command in such reformation, under the above-mentioned serious, ecclesiastical ban and secular punishments (as the Reformatores shall make such punishments). And hereby command the common Auditor Curiae, Camerā apostolicā, and also the Gubernator of the city of Rome, and the Vicario in Spiritualibus, as such will be our officials at all times, that they assist the reported reformers to order, to execute and to carry out the aforementioned command, if they are required.

with all favor and encouragement, and due husk shall do.

6. And do not wish to prevent any privilege, liberty, apostolic worship, such as that reported by the see of Rome to officials, their colleges or offices in their appointment or direction, or to any other persons whatever their dignity, station or nature may be or be, by us or by the reported see of Rome, in general or in particular, as to form or substance, with the expression of certain special decrees or clauses, which have been or may be made, and whether they have been confirmed or negated once, twice, or several times. For all of these in measure, as if we had expressed their entire content and tenor word for word and clearly here, we want to have expressed and expressed here, as far as the above-mentioned reformation is concerned, and to have repealed and revoked them everywhere, as far as this matter is concerned, so that no one can or may protect himself with them, or with anything contrary to this bull.

(7) And all men are hereby forbidden to violate this bull of our statute, order, appointment, commandment, creation, serious prohibition, our will, and the above-mentioned abrogation of privileges, or to oppose the same by defiant boldness or iniquity. But if anyone should dare to do so, let him know that he will fall into the disgrace of Almighty God and of the holy apostles Peter and Paul. Given at Rome at St. Marcus, Anno of the Nativity of Christ 1536, on the 23rd day of the month of September, in the first year of our Papacy.

The above-mentioned Bulla of the Reformation is written and publicly posted at Rome, in Cancellaria apostolica, on Friday, the 27th day of August, in the year and under the Papacy, as reported above.

Schmalkaldic Articles

or "Articles of Christian Doctrine, which should have been delivered to the Concilium at Mantua, or where else it would have been", by D. Martin Luther written in 1537.

After Pope Paul III had announced a Concilium at Mantua (No. 1224), the Elector John Frederick ordered in a letter of 11 December 1536 (this letter is in Burkhardt, Luthers Briefwechsel, p. 271) Luther to draw up articles of doctrine, and to indicate in which articles one would like to yield and give way for the sake of peace or not. By January 25, 1537, at the latest, "such a list and concerns" were to reach the Elector (Burkhardt, 1. e. p. 272). Luther wrote these articles still in the year 1536 in December, submitted them, as the Elector had wished, on December 28 and the following days (De Wette, vol. V, p. 45) to Amsdorf, Agricola, Spalatin, and the other Wittenberg theologians, Jonas, Cruciger, Bugenhagen, and Melancthon (Spalatin's Annals, p. 307), for their consideration, and sent them, signed by himself and the same theologians, to the Elector through Spalatin on January 3, 1537. Melancthon had signed it with an addition in which he expresses himself about the authority to be granted to the pope. In a letter to Luther, dated January 7, 1537 (Kolde, Vunlsota, p. 287), the Elector expressed his displeasure with this addition. The Jena edition (1568), Vol. VI, p. 522, however, sharply castigates Melancthon's later conduct on the basis of this addition in a note; not the addition itself. In the Wittenberg edition the signatures are missing, thus also this addition. At the Convention of the Protestant Estates assembled in Schmalkalden in February 1537, the articles were approved and signed by them. The signing, however, was not done as a solemn act of the convention, but in a free manner; the other theologians also signed neither on the same day nor in the same place.

The original manuscript by the hand of Luther is at the Heidelberg University Library Oock. Untat. Osm. 423 and was published in 1817 by Marheineke. In front of it there is not the preface, which Luther made later for the print, but only a preface consisting of six short lines. The articles were printed only in the year 1538. The edition was provided by Luther himself, and thereby some changes by additions and omissions occurred, which however do not alter the sense (J. T. Müller, die symbolischen Bücher, p. HXXVII). The first edition has the title: "Artickel, so da hetten soll auff Concilion zu Mantua, oder wo es würde sein, überantwortet werden, von vnsern teils wegen. And what we accept or give announced or not 2c. D. Mart. Luth. Wittemberg. N. V.XXXVIII." At the end: "Printed at Wittemberg by Hans Lufft. M.D.XXXVIII." Eight sheets in quarto. In the same year two other editions in quarto followed, then in the years 1543 and 1545 two octavo editions, which Luther himself arranged. Among many other editions, which were published in Wittenberg in 1550 by Peter Seiz the Younger, in Jena in 1555 by Christian Rvdinger, in 1557 by Thomas Rebart in Jena, in 1559 there by Christian Rödinger's heirs, and by the Wittenberg theologians in 1575 and 1576, we mention only one, which originated from Spalatin's copy, which is in the archives in Weimar, was available at the convention in Schmalkalden and was signed there: "Articles of the Evangelical Lere, so da hetten sollen auff Concilium überantwortet werden 2c. Now everything from Vrsachen reported in the preface, from Fürst. Order at Weymar by the court preachers there. ÄVIUII." Quarto. This edition was included in the German Concordienbuch in 1580. The name Schmalkaldic Articles was not attached to them until 1553 in this edition (see J. T. Müller 1. e. S. I,XXXVIII).

in the disputes between the Weimar and the Wittenberg theologians, and has remained ever since. Wherever the Schmalkaldic Articles are spoken of before this time, it is not to be understood of these, but of those of the Conventions which were held at Schmalkalden (1529, 1531 and 1540).

The Schmalkaldic Articles were translated into Latin by a Dane studying in Wittenberg, Li. Petrus Generanus, who was studying in Wittenberg, and, with a preface by Veit Amerbach, printed in 1541 by Joseph Clug in Wittenberg. Probably because of Amerbach's preface, who later defected to the Papists and became professor of philosophy at Ingolstadt (De Wette, Vol. V, p. 629), not this good translation was included in the Concordienbuch, but a far worse one, which, though attributed to Selnecker, is most probably taken from an Allsgabe that appeared at Wittenberg in 1579, since Selnecker's text of 1580 reproduces the same conspicuous error i) that is found in this edition. By the way, Selnecker himself published a German-Latin edition in 1582, in which the original Latin text of the appendix is given, which was then included in the Concordienbuch. The Generanus edition appeared again in Wittenberg in 1542, but without Amerbach's preface. Another edition also appeared without Luther's name, as is evident from the ko^troinus Outu1c>AU8 Uaeretioor. liomao oonttatus 1559 ouw tutt. VsrMrii. 1560. where it appears among the Books inoorti nowinm is cited.

Two counter-pamphlets against the Schmalkaldic Articles have appeared, one by Cochläus, whose name is not mentioned on the title, but in the preface, at Leipzig by Nicolaus Wolrab; the other by Georg Wicel, also at Leipzig, in 1538.

In the "Gesammtausgabe" our writing is found: in the Wittenberg (1553), vol. IV, p. 416; in the Jena (1568), vol. VI, p. 509; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 1227; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 205; in the Erlanger (I.), vol. 25, p. 109, and in the second edition, vol. 25, p. 163. We give the text according to J. T. Müller, "die symbolischen Bücher," p. 295.

That's enough teaching for the life in the church. By the way, in the

1) One can hardly say: misprint, since "the highest and last court is translated by ultiruum ksraulum (court at dinner) instead of släioium (decision, judgment).

2) The manuscript in its present state must be very illegible. Marheineke has in this short preface, moreover, that he has omitted this word, We have enough of the laws with which we are afflicted in our worldly government and in our domestic affairs, so that it is not necessary to invent others besides these complaints. There is enough of those whom we know, and let wickedness end.

Preface V. Mart. Luther.

1. Since the pope Paul, of the name of the third, announced a council last year, to be held at Mantua on Pentecost, and afterwards moved away from Mantua, that it was not yet known where he would or could put it, and that we should provide for ourselves on our part, that we would either also be called to the Concilio, or be condemned without being called, I was commanded to place articles of our doctrine, and to bring them together, whether it would come to action, what and how far we wanted to or could give way to the Papists, and on which we finally intended to insist and remain.

(2) Accordingly I have brought these articles together and delivered them to our part. They have also been accepted by us, and unanimously confessed, and it has been decided that they should be publicly delivered (if the pope with his own should one day be so bold as to hold a right free council without lies and deceit, as he would certainly be obliged to do), and that we should present our confession of faith.

003 But because the Roman court is so dreadful of a free Christian council, and the light shines so shamefully, that he has taken away the hope even of those who are of his part, as if he would never suffer a free Christian council, much less hold it himself, whereupon, how justly, they are almost angry, and have no small complaint about it, than those who perceive that the pope would rather lose the whole of Christendom, and have all souls no less than seven question marks with which he doubts a fine solution. E. Hermann, who has discussed this preface in detail in the Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht by Dove and Friedberg, vol. 17, 1882, pp. 231-242, remarks here: "Only traces of a strongly abbreviated word, which must have been sooltzsius," and furthermore brings to his solution, which we reproduce here according to the Erlangen edition, several "perhaps."

before he wants to reform himself or his own a little, and have a measure set for his tyranny: Nevertheless, I have wanted to publish these articles by public pressure, if I should die before, because a concilium would (as I fully expect and hope), because the light-avoiding and day-shunning rogues have such a miserable trouble, and prevent the concilium, so that those who live and remain after me may have my testimony and confession to present, over and above the confession that I have previously made, on which I have remained until now, and will remain, with God's grace.

Four. For what shall I say? How shall I complain? I am still alive, writing, preaching, and reading daily, yet such poisonous men are found, not only among the adversaries, but also false brethren, who want to be of our part, who presume to lead my writing and teaching straight against me; let me watch and listen, whether they know that I teach differently, and want to adorn their poison with my work, and seduce the poor people under my name; what will become more and more after my death?

(5) Yea, I ought to answer for all things, because I am yet alive. Yes, again, how can I alone shut all the devil's mouths? especially to those (as they are all poisoned) who do not want to hear or notice what we write, but only practice with all diligence how they may most shamefully pervert and corrupt our words in all letters. To such I let the devil answer, or finally God's wrath, as they deserve.

(6) I often think of the good Gerson, who doubts whether one should write something good in public. If one does not, many souls are lost that could be saved; but if one does, the devil is there with innumerable poisonous, evil mouths, which poison and pervert everything, so that the fruit is prevented. But what they gain by it is seen in the day. For since they have lied so shamefully against us, and have tried to keep the people with lies, God has continued his work, making their multitude smaller and ours larger, and disgracing them with their lies, and still continues to do so.

(7) I must tell you a story. Here in Wittenberg a doctor was sent from France, who said publicly before us that his king was sure and certain that there was no church, no authority, no marriage state among us, but that everything went among themselves like cattle, and everyone did as he pleased. Now then, how shall they look upon us in that day before the judgment seat of Christ, who have imagined such gross lies to the king, and to other countries, by their writing, to be the truth? Christ, the Lord and Judge of us all, knows very well that they have lied and lied, and that they will have to hear the judgment again; this I know for certain. May God convert to repentance those who are to be converted! For the rest it shall be called, Woe and ache for ever.

(8) And coming back to the matter at hand, I would indeed like to see a truly Christian council, so that many things and people would be helped. Not that we need it, for our churches are now, by the grace of God, so enlightened and equipped with the pure word and right use of the sacraments, with the knowledge of all kinds of states and right works, that we do not ask for a concilium here, and in such matters know neither to hope nor to expect anything better from the concilium; but in the bishoprics everywhere we see many parishes empty and desolate that one's heart would break. And yet neither bishops nor canons ask how the poor people live or die, for whom Christ died, and they should not hear him speak to them as the right shepherd to his sheep, so that I am afraid and afraid that one day he will let an angelic council go over Germany, which will ruin us all like Sodom and Gomorrah, because we mock it so unjustly with the council.

(9) There are innumerable great things to be corrected in the secular world about such necessary church matters. There is disunity among princes and estates, usury and avarice have been torn down like a flood of sin, and vain law has become, wantonness, fornication, arrogance with clothes, eating, playing, flaunting, with all kinds of vice and wickedness, disobedience of the subjects, servants and workers, of all trades, also of the peasants.

have so outgrown it that ten councils and twenty imperial congresses will not make it right again. If one were to deal with such main matters of the spiritual and secular state, which are against God, in the Concilio, one would probably get one's hands full, so that in the meantime one would forget the children's game and folly of long skirts, large plates, wide belts, bishops' and cardinals' hats or staffs, and such jugglery. If we had first obeyed God's command and order in the spiritual and secular realms, we would have found time enough to reform the food, clothing, plates and casel. If, however, we devour such cameos, and for this we want to sweat gnats, leave the beams standing, and straighten the splinters, then we would probably also be satisfied with the Concilio.

010 For this reason I have set forth few articles, because without this we have so much command from God to do in the church, in the authorities, in the house, that we can never carry them out. What is the point, or what is the use, of making many decrees and statutes about this in the Council, especially if these principal things commanded by God are not respected or kept? It is as if he had to celebrate our play of jiggery-pokery for trampling underfoot his serious commandments. But our sins oppress us and do not allow God to have mercy on us, for we do not repent, nor do we want to defend all abominations.

(11) O dear Lord JESUS CHRIST, keep thou thy own concilium, and deliver thine own by thy glorious future! It is lost with the pope and his. They do not want thine. Help us, then, poor and miserable, who groan unto thee, and seek thee with earnestness, according to the grace which thou hast given us, through thy Holy Spirit, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Father, evermore vowed, Amen.

The first part

nts articles of divine majesty, as:

I. that Father, Son and Holy Spirit, in One Divine Being and Nature, are three distinct Persons, one God, who created heaven and earth.

II. That the Father is born of no man, the Son of the Father, the Holy Ghost proceeding from the Father and the Son.

III That not the Father, nor the Holy Ghost, but the Son was made man.

IV. That the Son was thus made man, that he was conceived of the Holy Ghost without man's consent, and that he was born of the pure holy virgin Mary. After this he suffered, died, was buried, went to hell, rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God, to judge the quick and the dead, 2c. as the apostle, item, St. Athanasii Symbolum, and the common children's catechism teaches.

These articles are in no dispute or controversy, because we confess the same to both parts. Therefore, it is not necessary to discuss them further now.

The other part is of the articles, so concerning the ministry and work of JESu Christ, or our salvation.

Here is the first and main article:

1. that Jesus Christ our God and Lord "died for our sins, and rose again for our righteousness," Rom. 4:25, and that "he alone is the Lamb of God, which bareth the sin of the world," Jn. 1:29, and that "God hath laid on him the sins of us all," Isa. 53:6. item: "They are all sinners, and are justified without merit by his grace, through the redemption of Jesus Christ in his blood." 2c. Rom. 3, 23. 24.

002 Forasmuch then as these things must be believed, and otherwise by no works, law, or merit, can they be attained or obtained, it is clear and certain that such faith alone justifieth us. As Rom. 3:28, St. Paul saith, "We hold that a man is justified without works of the law, through faith." Item 26: "That he alone might be justified, and justify him that believeth in Jesus."

003 From this article nothing can depart or yield, let heaven and earth fall, or whatsoever will not abide. "For there is none other name given among men, whereby we may be saved," saith Peter.

Apost. 4:12, "and by his wounds we are healed," Isa. 53:5, and on this article stands all that we teach and live against the pope, the devil, and the world. Therefore we must be quite sure of it, and not doubt, or all is lost, and the pope and the devil, and all things against us, shall have the victory and be justified.

The other article. From the fair.

004 That the mass in the papacy must be the greatest and most dreadful abomination, as it striveth hard and mightily against the principal article, and yet hath been the highest and most beautiful above and before all other papal idolatries. For it is held that such a sacrifice or work of the Mass (even done by a wicked wicked man) helps man from sins, both here in life and there in purgatory; which, however, the Lamb of God alone should and must do, as stated above. Neither is this article to be relinquished, nor is it to be abated; for the first article suffers no such thing.

(5) And if there were any sensible papists, one would speak to them in such a friendly manner, first of all, why do they hold so hard to the mass? For it is nothing but the feet of men, not commanded by God. And we may let go of all human fools, as Christ says, Matt. 15:9: "They serve me in vain with the commandments of men."

006 Secondly, it is an unnecessary thing, which it is well to leave without sin and driving.

007 Thirdly, the sacrament may be much better and more blessedly obtained after the institution of Christ. What is the point of forcing the world into misery and distress for the sake of a fictitious, unnecessary thing, when it can otherwise be had well and more blessedly?

008 Let it be preached publicly unto the people, how the mass, being a man's worship, may remain without sin, and that no man be damned that respecteth it not, but may be saved without the mass, by a better way. What does it matter if the mass then will not fall from itself? not only with the mad mob, but also with all pious, Christian, reasonable, God-fearing hearts. Much more, when they hear that it is a dangerous thing, invented and contrived without God's word and will.

(9) Fourthly, because such innumerable, unspeakable abuses have arisen throughout the world in the buying and selling of fairs, it ought to be let alone to prevent such abuses, even if it had something useful and good in itself. How much more should it be allowed to prevent such abuses forever, because it is quite unnecessary, useless and dangerous, and one can have everything more necessary, useful and certain without the fair.

(10) Now, fifthly, if the mass is nothing else, nor can be anything else (as the Canon and all the books say), but a work of men (even of wicked men), that one may reconcile himself, and others with himself, against God, and obtain and merit forgiveness of sins and grace (for thus it is kept, if it is kept at the very best; what else should it be?), then it ought and must be condemned and rejected. For this is contrary to the main article, which says that it is not a wicked or pious minister who bears our sins with his work, but the Lamb of God and Son of God.

011 And if any man would pretend, for the sake of appearances, that he would tell or communicate himself for devotion, he is not in earnest. For if he is serious about communicating, he has certainly done so, and in the best way, in the sacrament, after the institution of Christ. But to communicate himself is a human conceit, uncertain and unnecessary, and forbidden. Nor does he know what he is doing, because without God's word he follows false human pride and ignorance. So it is also not right (if everything else were bad) for a man to use the common sacrament of the church according to his own devotion, and to play communion with it as he pleases, without God's word, outside the church.

012 This article of the mass shall be the whole of it in the Conciliar. For if it were possible for them to yield to us all the other articles, they cannot yield to this article. As Campegius said at Augsburg, he would let himself be torn to pieces before he would let the mass go. So too, with God's help, I will let myself be reduced to ashes before I let a server with his work, whether good or evil, be like my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

be higher. So we are and remain eternally divided and opposed to one another. They know well, where the mass falls, there lies the priesthood. Before they do so, they kill us all where they can.

(13) Above all these things this dragon's tail, the fair, hath begotten many an idolatry of vermin and filth.

(14) First, there is purgatory. Masses, vigils, the seventh, the thirtieth, and annual celebrations, and finally the common week, and the day and bath of all souls in purgatory, have been used so that the mass is used almost exclusively for the dead, even though Christ instituted the sacrament exclusively for the living. Therefore, purgatory, with all its splendor, worship, and trade, is to be regarded as a mere devil's ghost. For it is contrary to the main article, that Christ alone, and not the works of men, should help souls. Without this, nothing else is commanded or commanded to us by the dead. For this reason, it may well be left alone, if it were neither error nor idolatry.

(15) The papists here cite Augustine and some of the fathers who are said to have written of purgatory, and think that we do not see to what end and whither they lead such sayings. St. Augustine does not write that there is a purgatory, nor does he have any Scripture that compels him to do so, but leaves it in doubt whether there is one, and says that his mother desired that she should be remembered at the altar or sacrament. Now all this is nothing but the devotion of individuals, who do not establish any articles of faith (which belong to God alone).

(16) But our papists lead such a human word to believe that one should sacrifice to their shameful, blasphemous, accursed fair of Masses in Purgatory 2c. Such they will not prove from St. Augustino for a long time. Now when they have done with the sacrilegious fair, of which St. Augustine never dreamed, let us talk with them whether St. Augustine's word without Scripture may be tolerated, and the dead remembered in the Sacrament. It is not valid to make articles of faith out of the holy fathers' work or word.

Otherwise it would also have to become an article of faith what they had for food, clothing, houses, 2c. as was done with the sanctuary. The Word of God is said to be an article of faith, and no one else, not even an angel.

(17) Secondly, it follows that the evil spirits have done much evil, appearing as the souls of men, and have preached masses, vigils, pilgrimages, and other alms, with unspeakable lies and mischiefs. Which we all hold to be articles of faith and must live by them, and the pope confirms this, as well as the mass and all other abominations. There is also no turning back or slackening.

(18) Thirdly, the pilgrimages, where masses were sought, forgiveness of sins, and the grace of God. For the mass ruled it all. Now it is certain that without God's word such pilgrimages are not commanded, nor are they necessary, because we may be better off, and leave them without all sin and driving. Why then does one leave at home one's own parish, God's word, wife and child 2c., which are necessary and commanded, and run after the unnecessary, uncertain, harmful cirrus of the devil, without the devil having ridden the pope to praise and confirm such things, so that people often fall from Christ to their own works and become idolatrous, which is the worst thing about it, over and above that it is unnecessary, unbidden, inadvisable, and uncertain, and also harmful; therefore there is no yielding or giving way here. 2c. And let it be preached that it is unnecessary and dangerous, and see where pilgrimages remain.

(19) Fourthly, the brotherhoods, where the monasteries, convents, and also vicars have committed themselves, and shared (right and honest purchase) all masses, good works, 2c., both for the living and the dead, which is not only vain man's work, without the word of God, quite unnecessary and unbidden, but also contrary to the first article of salvation, therefore by no means to be suffered.

020 Fifthly, the sanctuary, wherein are invented many a public lie and fool's work, of dogs' and horses' bones, which also for the sake of such superstition, that the devil hath been

The fact that the church laughed long ago should have been condemned, even if there were something good in it, is also without God's word, neither commanded nor advised, quite unnecessary and useless thing. But the most important thing is that it must also work indulgence and forgiveness of sins, as a good work and service, like the mass 2c.

(21) In the sixth place, here is the indulgence, which is given both to the living and to the dead (but for money), and in which the afflicted Judas or Pope sells the merits of Christ, together with the rest of the merits of all the saints and of the whole church; 2c. All of which is not to be suffered, and not only without God's word, without necessity, unbidden, but contrary to the first article. For Christ's merit is not obtained by our work or penny, but by grace through faith, without all money and merit, not by Pabst's power, but brought forward by the preaching or God's word.

Of invocation of the saints.

(22) The calling of the saints is also one of the abuses of the end-Christians, and is contrary to the first principal article, and destroys the knowledge of Christ. Neither is it commanded, nor advised, nor is it exemplified in Scripture; and all things are a thousand times better in Christ, if they were as good as they are, but they are not.

023 And though the angels in heaven pray for us, as Christ himself doeth, so also the saints on earth, or perhaps in heaven; yet it doth not follow that we should call upon the angels and saints, worship them, fast unto them, celebrate with them, say mass unto them, offer churches, altars, worship, and other things, and think them helpers in need, and divide all manner of help among them. It does not follow from this that we should call upon the angels and saints, worship them, fast, celebrate mass with them, offer sacrifices, endow churches, altars, worship, and serve them in other ways, and hold them to be helpers in need, and divide all kinds of help among them, appropriating a special one to each, as the papists teach and do, for this is idolatry; and such honor belongs to God alone. For thou, as a Christian and a saint on earth, canst pray for me, not in one need, but in all needs. But therefore I shall not worship thee, call upon thee, celebrate, fast, sacrifice, say mass in thy honor, and put my faith in thee for salvation. Otherwise I can honor, love, and thank you in Christ. Now, when such idolatrous honor is taken away by the angels and dead saints, The other honor will be without harm, and will soon be forgotten. For when there is no longer any hope of benefit or help, either bodily or spiritual, the saints will leave them in peace, both in the grave and in heaven; for in vain, or for love, no one will much remember, respect, or honor them.

024 And in sum, what the mass is, what is derived from it, what is attached to it, we cannot suffer, and must condemn, that we may keep the holy sacrament pure and certain, according to the institution of Christ, used and received by faith.

The third article. Of foundations and monasteries.

(25) That the monasteries and convents, founded in time past in good opinion, should again be ordered to educate learned men and virtuous women, according to such custom, that they may have pastors, preachers, and other ecclesiastics, and other necessary persons for secular government, in cities and countries, also well-bred virgins for housemothers and housekeepers. 2c.

026 If they will not serve this purpose, it is better that they should be left desolate, or that they should be pulled down, than that they, with their blasphemous worship invented by men, should be held as something better than the common Christian state and the offices and orders established by God. For all this is contrary to the first principal article of the redemption of Jesus Christ. Moreover, that they (like all other human beings) are not commanded, not necessary, not useful, and make dangerous and futile efforts, as the prophets call such worship services, "efforts.

The fourth article. From the papacy.

027 That the pope is not jure divino, or from the word of God, the head of all Christendom (for this belongs to one only, who is called Jesus Christ), but only bishop or pastor of the churches at Rome, and of those who have willingly, or by human creature (that is, temporal authority), come to him, not to be Christians under him as a lord, but next to him as brothers and fellows, as also the old Concilia and the time of St. Cyprian indicate.

Twenty-eight. But now no bishop may call the pope...

He shall not call him brother, as at that time, but shall call him his most gracious lord, even if he were king or emperor. We will not, we ought not, and we cannot take it upon our consciences; but if any man will do it, let him do it without us.

029 From this it follows that all that the pope has done and has undertaken out of such false, sacrilegious, blasphemous, usurped power, has been and still is vain devilish history and business (without regard to the bodily government, in which God may well do much good to a people through a tyrant and a knave), to the corruption of the whole holy Christian church (as much as was in it), and to the disturbance of the first principal article, of the redemption of JESUS CHRIST.

030 For there stand all his bulls and books, wherein he roareth as a lion, as the angel formeth Revelation 12:1 and following, that no Christian can be saved, except he be obedient unto him, and be subject unto him in all things, whatsoever he will, whatsoever he saith, whatsoever he doeth. Which is nothing else, but thus much said, Though thou believest in Christ, and hast all things in him that are necessary unto salvation, yet is it nothing, and all in vain, if thou hold not me thy God, and be subject and obedient unto me. For it is evident that the holy church has been without a pope for at least five hundred years, and that to this day the Greek churches and many other languages have never been under a pope, nor are they yet. Thus, as has often been said, it is a man's poem that is not commanded, without need and in vain; for the holy Christian church can well remain without such a head, and would probably have remained better if such a head had not been raised up by the devil. Nor is the papacy of any use in the church, for it exercises no Christian office, and so the church must remain and exist without the pope.

(31) And I suppose that the pope would not be supreme in law or by the commandment of God, but that, in order that the unity of the Christians against the herds and heresies might be the better preserved, there should be one head to which the others should all adhere. Such a head would then be chosen by men, and it would be in the power of human choice and authority to change the same head, to deprive it of its authority, and to make it a head.

As the Council of Constance held almost the same way with the popes, they deposed three of them and elected the fourth. I now suppose that the pope and the see of Rome would want to accept such a thing, which is impossible, for he would have to reverse and destroy his entire rule and position, with all its rights and books; in sum, he cannot do it. For since one would not have to be subject to such a head by God's command, but out of human good will, it would be despised very easily and soon, and in the end it would not keep a member, nor would it always have to be in Rome or some other place, but where and in which church God would have given such a man who would be capable of it. O that would become a vast, desolate being!

32 For this cause the church can never be governed and preserved better than that we should all live under one head, Christ, and that the bishops should all be equal in office (though unequal in gifts), diligently holding together in one doctrine, faith, sacraments, prayers, and works of charity 2c., as St. Jerome writes, that the priests of Alexandria governed the church together and in common, as did the apostles, and afterward all the bishops in all Christendom, until the pope lifted up his head above them all.

(033) This piece shows plainly that he is the true end-Christ or antichrist, who has set himself above and against Christ, and exalted himself, because he will not let the Christians be saved without his power, which is nothing, not ordered or commanded by God. This actually means, "to set oneself above God and against God," as St. Paul says in 2 Thess. 2:4. Nevertheless, neither the Turk nor the fool does this, as they are great enemies of the Christians, but lets whoever wants to believe in Christ, and takes bodily interest and obedience from the Christians.

034 But the pope will not believe, but saith, Let men obey him, and they shall be saved. We will not do this, or die over it, in the name of God. All this comes from the fact that he should have been called jure divino supreme over Christianity.

Church. Therefore he must make himself equal to Christ and above Christ, and make himself the head, then lord of the churches, and finally of the whole world, and badly boast of an earthly god, until he also supported the angels in the kingdom of heaven. And if one distinguishes Pabst's doctrine from the holy Scriptures, or sets it against them and holds it up, it is found that Pabst's doctrine, where it is best of all, is taken from the imperial, pagan law, and teaches worldly dealings and courts, as his Decretales testify; after that it teaches ceremonies of churches, garments, food, persons, and children's play, larvae, and foolery without measure, but in all this nothing at all of Christ, faith, and God's commandments.

035 Lastly, the devil is nothing but a vain devil, since he practiseth his lies of masses, purgatory, monasticism, his own works, and worship (which then is the true priesthood), above and against God; damning, killing, and afflicting all Christians, who lift not up and honour such his abomination above all things. Therefore, as little as we can worship the devil himself for a lord and god, so little can we suffer his apostle, the pope or end-Christ, to be head or lord in his regiment. For to lie and murder, to destroy body and soul for ever, that is his papal rule in fact, as I have proved in many books.

(36) By these four articles they will have enough to condemn in the Council. For they cannot nor will they leave the least limb of the Articles to us; of this we must be sure, and consider the hope that Christ our Lord has attacked his adversary, and will press on, both with his spirit and future, amen.

037 For in the Concilio we shall not stand before the emperor or the temporal authorities (as at Augsburg), who would have a gracious decree, and in kindness let the matters be heard, but before the pope and the devil himself we shall stand there, who does not intend to hear anything, but to condemn, murder, and force to idolatry. Therefore we must not kiss his feet here, or say, You are my gracious Lord, but, as in Zechariah the angel said to the devil, "Punish yourself, God, Satan." [Zech. 3:2.]

The third part of the article.

The following pieces or articles we may discuss with scholars, rational people, or among ourselves; the pope and his kingdom do not pay much attention to them. For conscientiousness is nothing with them, but money, honor, and power.

I. From sin.

(1) Here we must confess, as St. Paul saith, Rom. 5:12, that sin is of Adam, the only man, descended, by which disobedience all men became sinners, subject to death and the devil. This is called original sin, or original sin.

(2) The fruits of these sins are the evil works forbidden in the Ten Commandments, such as unbelief, false faith, idolatry, being without fear of God, presumption, despair, blindness, and, in sum, not knowing or respecting God. After that, lying, swearing by God's name, not praying, not calling, not respecting God's word, disobeying parents, murdering, unchastity, stealing, deceiving 2c.

(3) Such original sin is such a deep evil corruption of nature that no reason can know it, but must be believed from the revelation of Scripture, Ps. 51:7, Rom. 5:18, Ex. 33, Gen. 3:6; wherefore the vain error and blindness against this article, which the school theologians have taught, viz:

(4) That after the inheritance of Ada man's natural powers remain whole and uncorrupted, and that man by nature has right reason and good will, as the philosophers teach.

005 That a man may have free will to do good, and to forbear evil; and again, to forbear good, and to forbear evil.

006 That man by his natural powers may do and keep all the commandments of God.

Item 7: Let him by natural powers love God above all things, and his neighbor as himself.

008 For if a man do as much as is in him, God will surely give him his grace.

009 Item, if he will go to the sacrament, it is not necessary that he have a good intention to do good, but be sufficient that he have not an evil intention to do good.

010 Let it not be found in the scriptures, that the Holy Ghost with his grace is necessary unto good works.

011 Such things, and many like them, are of ignorance and unawareness, both of sins, and of Christ our Saviour; true heathen doctrine, which we cannot endure. For if this doctrine be true, then Christ died in vain, because there is no harm nor sin in man for which he should die, or had died for the body only, and not for the soul also, because the soul is sound, and the body only is of death.

II. from the law.

012 Here we hold that the law was given of God, first, to control sin with threatenings and terrors of punishment, and with promises and offerings of grace and mercy. But all this has turned out badly because of the wickedness that sin has wrought in man. For some of them are worse than those who are under the law, because they reject what they like to do and reject what they do not like to do. Therefore, when they are able to escape punishment, they do more against the law than before. These are the wicked men who do evil in every place where they have room.

013 Others are blind and presumptuous, and think that they keep and can keep the law out of their own strength, as is now said above of the school theologians: from whence come hypocrites and false saints.

014 But the chief office or power of the law is to reveal original sin, with its fruits and all, and to show man how deeply his nature has fallen and been corrupted without cause, when the law must tell him that he neither has nor respects God, and worships strange gods, which he would not have believed before and without the law. Thus he is frightened, humiliated, despondent, desperate, would like to be helped, and does not know where to start from, and begins to be angry with God and to murmur 2c. This then is Rom. 4:15, "The law provokes wrath"; and Rom. 5:13, "Sin is increased by the law."

III. of repentance.

015 Such is the office which the New Testament retains, and also practices, as St. Paul does, Rom. 1:18, saying, "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all men." Item, Cap. 3,10.: "All the world is guilty before God. And no man is righteous before Him." And Christ Joh. 16:8. "The Holy Ghost shall punish the world for sin."

016 Now this is the thunderbolt of God, that he may smite both manifest sinners and false saints in one heap, and leave none to be right, and drive them all into terror and despair. This is the hammer (as Jeremiah Cap. 23, 29. saith), "My word is a hammer that breaketh the rocks." This is not activa contritio, a made repentance, but passiva contritio, the real heartache, suffering, and feeling of death.

017 And this then is the beginning of right repentance, and a man must here hear such a judgment, saying, There is nothing the matter with you all; ye are public sinners or saints; ye must all become and do otherwise than ye now are and do; ye are who ye are, and how great, wise, mighty, and holy, as ye would be. There is no one pious here.

018 But to such a ministry the New Testament quickly adds the comforting promise of grace through the gospel, which is to be believed, as Christ saith, Marc. 1:15, Repent, and believe the gospel: that is, become and do otherwise, and believe my promise. And before him John is called a preacher of repentance, but for the remission of sins, that is, he should punish them all and make them sinners, that they might know what they were in the sight of God, and know themselves to be lost men, and so be prepared unto the Lord to receive grace, and to wait for and receive forgiveness of sins from him. So Christ himself says Luc. 24, 27, "repentance and forgiveness of sins must be preached in my name throughout the world.

019 But where the law worketh alone, without the help of the gospel, there is death and hell, and man must despair, as Saul and Judas. As St. Paul says, "The law killeth through sin."

Again, the gospel does not give comfort and forgiveness in one way, but by word, sacrament, and the like, as we shall hear, so that salvation may abound with God, as the 130th Psalm, v. 7, says, against the great prison of sin.

020 But now we must hold the false repentance of the sophists against the right repentance, that they both may be the more truly understood.

Of the false repentance of the papists.

021 It was impossible for them to teach rightly of repentance, because they knew not the right sins. For, as was said above, they do not hold rightly to original sin, but say that the natural powers of man remain whole and undefiled, that reason can teach rightly, and that the will can do rightly according to it, that God certainly gives his grace when a man does as much as is in him according to his free will.

022 From this it must follow that they alone atoned for real sins, as, evil thoughts (for evil motion, lust, irritation, was not sin), evil words, evil works, which free will might well have left undone.

(23) And to such repentance they put three parts, repentance, confession, and satisfaction, with this consolation and promise: if a man repented, confessed, and satisfied himself, he would have earned forgiveness and paid for his sin before God. Thus the people were instructed in repentance on the confidence of their own works. Hence the word in the pulpit when the common confession was recited to the people: "Free my life, O Lord God, until I atone for my sin and improve my life.

(24) Here there was no thought of Christ, and nothing of faith, but one hoped to overcome and blot out sin before God with one's own works. We also became priests and monks of the opinion that we wanted to put ourselves against sin.

(25) Thus was it done with repentance: because no one could consider all his sins (especially those committed during the whole year), they mended the pelt thus: if the hidden sins were afterwards remembered, they must also repent and confess them 2c. However, they were commanded by the grace of God.

026 Moreover, because no man knew how great repentance should be, that it might be sufficient in the sight of God, they gave this comfort: he that could not have contrition, that is, repentance, ought to have attrition; which I may call a half repentance, or the beginning of repentance. For they themselves have not understood either, nor do they yet know what it is said, any more than I do. Such attritio was then counted as a condition when one went to confession.

027 And if it came to pass, that any man said he could not repent, nor be sorry for his sin, as if it had been done in harlotry or revengefulness, 2c. they asked whether he did not wish, or desire, that he might repent? Did he then say: Yes (for who would say no here but the devil himself?) they took it for repentance, and forgave him his sin on such his good work. Here they used St. Bernard as an example 2c.

028 Here we see how blind reason gropes in the things of God, and seeks comfort in its own works, according to its own conceit, and cannot think of Christ or faith. If we look at it in the light, such repentance is a thought made up and composed of one's own strength, without faith, without knowledge of Christ, in which the poor sinner, if he had thought of lust or revenge, would sometimes rather have laughed than wept; except those who have either met with the law rightly, or have been plagued by the devil in vain with a sad spirit; otherwise such repentance has certainly been pure hypocrisy, and has not killed the lust of sins. For they had to repent, and would rather have sinned more if they had been free.

- 029 Thus it was with confession, that every man must tell all his sins, which is an impossible thing; and it was a great torment. But those he had forgotten were forgiven him so far, if they came to his mind, that he still had to confess them. Thus he could never know when he had confessed purely enough, or when confession should come to an end. Nevertheless, he was pointed to his deeds and thus comforted: the purer he confessed, and the more he was ashamed, and thus disgraced himself before the priest, the sooner and better he would be satisfied for the sin, for such humility would certainly earn him favor with God.

030 Neither was there faith nor Christ here, neither was the power of absolution told him; but to count sin, and to be ashamed, was his consolation. But it is not to be counted what torture, evil and idolatry such confessions have caused.

031 Atonement is yet the most far-reaching thing. For no man could know how much he should do for a few sins, let alone for all of them. Here they found a counsel, namely, that they set up a few penances, which could be kept, as five pater noster, one day of fasting, 2c., and with the rest of the penance they were sent to purgatory.

032 Now here also was great misery and distress. Some thought they would never get out of purgatory, because according to the old canons seven years of penance belongs to one mortal sin. Still there was confidence in our work of atonement. And if the atonement might have been perfect, the trust would have stood on it, and neither faith nor Christ would have been of any use; but it was impossible. Now if a man had served a hundred years, he would not have known when he had served his penance. That is, he would always have done penance and never come to repentance.

033 Now the holy see of Rome came to the aid of the poor church, and invented the indulgence; and with it he pardoned and abolished the pardon, first of all individually, seven years, a hundred years, 2c., and divided it among the cardinals and bishops, that one might give an indulgence of a hundred years, and one of a hundred days. But to cancel the whole pardon he reserved for him alone.

034 And it came to pass, when the money was ready to be borne, and the bull market was good, that he devised the golden year, and sent it to Rome; which he called the pardon of all chastisement and iniquity. Then the people ran to him, for everyone would have liked to be rid of the heavy, unbreakable burden. This meant finding and raising the treasures of the earth. Quickly the pope hurried on, and made many golden years one after the other. But the more he devoured money, the wider was his throat. Therefore he sent it out by legates into the countries, until all churches and houses were full of golden years. And at the last he was also cast into purgatory among the dead, first with masses and vigils, then with indulgences and the golden year, and finally the souls became so cheap that he gave one away for a sword groschen.

035 And yet all this did not help. For the pope, though he taught the people to rely and trust in such indulgences, yet he himself also made it uncertain. For in his bull he said that whoever wished to benefit from the indulgence or the golden year must repent and confess, and give money. Now we have heard above that such repentance and confession is uncertain among them, and hypocrisy. Likewise no man knew which soul was in purgatory; and if there were any in it, no man knew which had truly repented and confessed. So he took the money, and in the mean time put them off to his power and indulgence, and yet sent them again to their uncertain work.

036 Wherefore there were some that were not guilty of such real sins in thought, word, and deed, as I and my like in monasteries and convents, monks and priests, wished to be, who with fasting, vigil, prayer, mass, hard clothing, and bed 2c. resisted evil thoughts, and with earnestness and violence wished to be holy, and yet the inherent evil did, as it were, in sleep (as St. Augustine and Jerome with others confess), which is its manner. (As St. Augustine and Jerome with others confess), which is his way, yet each thought of the other that some were as holy as we taught, who were without sin, full of good works, so that thereupon we communicated and sold our good works to others, as superfluous to us to heaven. This is true, and there are seals, letters, and examples.

037 These were not allowed to repent. For what would they repent of, because they did not consent to evil thoughts? What would they confess, because they avoided words? For what would they do, because they were innocent of the deed? so that they might sell their remaining righteousness to other poor sinners. Such saints also were the Pharisees and scribes in the days of Christ.

038 Here cometh the fiery angel, St. John, the right preacher of repentance, and smiteth them both with thunder into one heap, saying, "Repent ye." [Matt. 3:2.] So think those:

But we have repented. These think, We are not allowed to repent. saith John, Repent ye both, for ye are false penitents, so are these false saints; and may ye both be forgiven of sins, because ye both know not yet what is right sin; hold your peace, that ye should repent of it, or avoid it. It is not good for either of you to be full of unbelief, ignorance, and ignorance of God and his will: for there he is, from whose fullness we must all receive grace for grace [John 3:16], and no man without him can be righteous in the sight of God. Therefore, if ye will repent, repent ye aright; your repentance doth not. And you hypocrites, who have no need of repentance, you snake-pullers, who has assured you that you will escape the wrath to come? 2c.

039 So St. Paul also preaches Rom. 3:10-12, saying, "There is none understanding, none righteous, none respecting God, none doing good, not even one; for they are all unrighteous and apostates. And Apost. 17:30: "But now God giveth all men, in all places, to repent." "All men" (saith he), none excepted that are men. This repentance teaches us to recognize sin, namely, that [it is] lost with us all, skin and hair not good, and must become bad new and different men.

040 This repentance is not lumpy and beggarly, as that which expiates real sins; neither is it uncertain, as that. For it disputeth not which is sin, or which is not sin; but it casteth all things into heaps, and saith, All and all sin is with us. What shall we long seek, divide, or distinguish? Wherefore even here repentance is not uncertain, for there remaineth nothing that we may think any good thing to pay for sin, but a mere, certain despair of all that we are, think, speak, or do 2c.

041 Neither can confession be false, uncertain, or deceitful. For he that confesseth that all things are sin with him understandeth all sin, leaving none out, and forgetting none. Neither, therefore, can repentance be uncertain, for it is not our uncertain, sinful works, but the suffering and blood of the innocent Lamb of God, who bears the sin of the world.

042 Of this repentance preacheth John, and afterward Christ in the gospel, and we also. With this repentance we cast down Pabst and all that is built upon our good works. For all things are built upon a corrupt and vain foundation, which is called good works, or the law; when there is no good work, but wicked works; and no man doeth the law, as Christ saith, John 7:19, but transgresseth it all. Therefore the building is full of lies and hypocrisy, when it is most holy and most beautiful.

043 And repentance endureth unto death with Christians, because it bitteth with the rest of the sins of the flesh throughout the whole life, as St. Paul hath witnessed in Romans 7:2, that he struggled with the law of his members, 2c. not by his own strength, but by the gift of the Holy Ghost, which followeth upon the remission of sins. This gift cleanseth and purgeth out the rest of sins daily, and worketh to make a man clean and holy.

044 Of this the pope, the theologians, lawyers, nor any man knoweth not; but it is a doctrine from heaven, revealed by the gospel, and must be called heresy among the ungodly saints.

045 Again, if some of the spirits of the wicked should come, as there may be some already, and have come before me in the time of the riot, holding that all they which once received the Spirit, or remission of sins, or believed, if they sinned afterward, yet they continued in the faith, and such sin did them no harm, crying thus, Do what thou wilt, if thou believest, it is all nothing. Faith blots out all sin 2c. Say to this: If any man sin according to faith and the Spirit, he hath never had the Spirit and faith aright. I have had many such foolish men before me, and fear that there are still some such devils in them.

046 Therefore it is necessary to know and to teach, that if the holy people, having and feeling original sin, repent and contend against it daily, fall into public sin, as David did into adultery, murder, and blasphemy, then faith and the Spirit are gone [2 Sam. 11,

4. ff. ). For the Holy Spirit doth not suffer sin to have dominion and to prevail, that it may be accomplished; but he controulth and restraineth it, that it should not do what it will. But if it does what it wills, the Holy Spirit and faith are not with it. For it is said, as St. John [1 Ep. 3, 9.] says, "He that is born of God sinneth not, neither can he sin." And yet is also the truth (as the same St. John writes), "If we say that we have no sin, we lie, and God's truth is not in us."

IV. From the Gospel.

(47) Let us now return to the gospel, which does not give counsel and help against sin in one way or another; for God is abundant in his grace, first by the oral word, in which is preached the forgiveness of sins in all the world, which is the true ministry of the gospel. Secondly, through baptism. Thirdly, by the holy sacrament of the altar. Fourthly, by the power of the keys, and also per mutuuw eolloHuini et eonsolgUonem IrLtrum, 18, 20: Ilbi cluo luerint eonAreALti ete.

V. Of baptism.

(48) Baptism is nothing else than God's word in water, commanded by His institution, or as St. Paul says [Eph. 5:26]: 4iÄvo>erum in verbo, as also Augustine says: ^.eeeänt verbuin elementum, st üt Laernmentuin. And therefore we do not hold with St. Thomas and the preacher-monks, who forget the word "God's institution," and say: God has put a spiritual power into the water, which washes away sin through the water. Nor with Scoto and the barefoot monks, who teach that baptism washes away sins by the assistance of divine will, that is, that this washing away is done by God's will alone, not by word or water.

029 Of infant baptism we hold that infants ought to be baptized, because they also belong to the promised salvation which came through Christ, and the church ought to administer it to them.

VI Of the Sacrament of the Altar.

050 Of the sacrament of the altar we hold that the bread and wine of the Lord's supper are the true body and blood of Christ, and are given and received not only by pious Christians, but also by wicked Christians.

051 And that one should not give one form only. And we have no need of the high art which teaches us that under one form there is as much as under both, as the Sophists and the Council of Constance teach us. For though it be true that there is as much under one form as under both, yet the one form is not the whole order and institution instituted and commanded by Christ. And especially in God's name we condemn and curse those who not only allow both forms to stand, but also gloriously forbid, condemn, and lust as heresy, and thereby set themselves against and above Christ, our Lord and God. 2c.

022 Of transubstantiation we pay no heed to the sophistical sophistries, which teach that bread and wine leave or lose their natural nature, and that only the form and color of bread remain, and not really bread. For it rhymes most perfectly with Scripture that bread is there and remains, as St. Paul himself calls it [1 Cor. 10:16], "The bread which we break"; and, "So he eateth of the bread."

VII Of [the] keys.

(53) The keys are an office and power given to the church by Christ, to bind and loose sin, not only the gross and well known sins, but also the subtle and secret ones, which God alone knows, as it is written Ps. 19:13, "Who knoweth how much he sinneth?" and Paul himself complains that he serves the law of sin with the flesh. For it is not for us, but for God alone, to judge which, how great, and how much sins are, as it is written Ps. 143:2: "Go not into judgment with thy servant, for before thee no living man is righteous." And Paul 1 Cor. 4, 4. also saith, "I am conscious of nothing, but therefore I am not righteous."

VIII. Of the confession.

054 Because absolution, or the power of the key, is also a help and consolation against sin and evil consciences, established in the gospel by Christ, confession, or absolution, ought by no means to be omitted in the church, especially for the sake of stupid consciences, and also for the sake of the young raw people, that they may be interrogated and instructed in Christian doctrine.

55. But the recital of sins shall be free unto every man, whatsoever he will recount, or whatsoever he will not recount. For as long as we are in the flesh, we shall not lie, when we say, I am a poor man, full of sin, Rom. 7:23, "I feel another law in my members," 2c. For since the absolutio private comes from the office of the key, it is not to be despised, but held high and worthy, like all the other offices of the Christian church.

56. And in these matters concerning the oral, outward word, it is to be firmly adhered to that God gives no one his spirit or grace without or with the preceding outward word, so that we may guard against the enthusiasts, that is, spirits who boast of having the spirit without and before the word, without and before the word, and judge, interpret, and stretch the Scripture or oral words to their liking, as Muenzer did, and still does much today, who want to be sharp judges between the spirit and the letter, and do not know what they say or put. For the papacy is also a vain enthusiasm, in which the pope boasts that all rights are in the shrine of his heart, and that what he judges and says with his church should be spirit and law, even if it is above and against Scripture or the oral word.

(57) All this is the old devil and the old serpent, who made Adam and Heba also enthusiasts, and led them from the outward word of God to spirits and conceit, and yet did it also by other outward words. Just as our enthusiasts also condemn the outward word, and yet they themselves are not silent, but chatter and write the world full, just as if the Spirit could not come through the writing or oral word of the apostles, but through their writing and words he ought to come. Why do they not leave their preaching and writing until the Spirit himself comes into the people, without and before their writing, as they boast that he came into them without the preaching of the Scriptures? There is no time here to argue about this, for we have done it enough.

058 For they also which believe before baptism, or are made believers in baptism, have it by outward sayings beforehand. For the ancients, when they came to their senses, must have heard beforehand, that whosoever believeth and is baptized is blessed, though they believed not till after ten years, when they received the Spirit and baptism. And Cornelius Apost. 10, 4. ff. had long before heard with deu Jews of the future Messiah, by which he was righteous before God, and his prayer and alms were acceptable in such faith (as Lucas calls him righteous and godly), and not without such previous word or hearing could believe nor be righteous. But St. Peter had to reveal to him that the Messiah (in whom he had believed until then) had now come, and his faith in the future Messiah did not keep him captive with the stubborn, unbelieving Jews, but knew that he now had to be saved by the present Messiah, and not deny Him with the Jews nor persecute Him 2c.

(59) In sum, enthusiasm has been in Adam and his children from the beginning to the end of the world, instilled and poisoned into them by the old dragon, and is the origin, strength and power of all heresy, including that of Pabstism and Mahomet. Therefore we should and must insist that God does not want to deal with us humans except through His outward Word and Sacrament. But everything that is praised by the Spirit without such Word and Sacrament is the devil. For God also wanted Most to appear first through the fiery Bufch and verbal Word [Ex. 3, 2]. And no prophet, neither Elias nor Eliseus, except or without the ten commandments got the spirit. And John the Baptist did not conceive without Gabriel's preceding word, nor without Mary's voice leap into his mother's womb [Luc. 1, 19. 45.]. And St. Peter speaketh s2. Ep. 1, 21.ft "The prophets have not by human will, but by the Hei-.

The Holy Spirit prophesied", but as the holy people of God. But without an outward word they were not holy, much less, when they were still unholy, would the Holy Spirit have driven them to speak, for they were holy, he says, because the Holy Spirit spoke through them.

IX. From the ban.

(60) The great excommunication, as it is called by the pope, we consider to be a lawful secular punishment, and is of no concern to us ecclesiastics. But the small one, that is the right Christian ban, that manifest, stiff-necked sinners should not be allowed to come to the sacrament or other fellowship of the church until they amend and avoid sin. And the preachers should not add to this spiritual punishment or banishment the temporal punishment.

X. Of the consecration and vocation.

(61) If the bishops would be true bishops, and take care of the church and the gospel, let it be given them for love and unity's sake, but not out of necessity, that they ordain and confirm us and our preachers. But put behind them all the trappings and trappings of an unchristian nature and appearance. But since they are not true bishops, nor do they want to be, but worldly lords and princes who neither preach, nor teach, nor baptize, nor communicate, nor want to do any work or ministry of the church, and persecute and condemn those who do such ministry, the church must not remain without ministers for their sake.

Therefore, as the ancient examples of the church and the fathers teach us, we ourselves want and should ordain capable persons to such an office. And this they have neither to forbid nor to hinder us, even according to their own law. For their rights say that those who are ordained even by heretics are to be called and remain ordained. Just as St. Jerome writes of the church at Alexandria, that it was first governed without bishops, but by priests and preachers in common.

XI. Of the marriage of priests.

022 That they have forbidden marriage, and have burdened the divine estate of the priests with perpetual chastity, they have no justification for it. nor right, but have acted as the end-christian, tyrannical, desperate boys, and thus given cause to all kinds of terrible, horrible, innumerable sin of unchastity, in which they are still stuck. Now as little as we or they have been given power to make a male into a female, or a female into a male, or both into nothing, so little have they had power to separate such creatures of God, or to forbid that they should not dwell together honestly and conjugally. Therefore, we do not want to consent to their unpleasant celibacy, nor do we want to suffer from it, but to have marriage freely, as God has ordered and instituted it. And we do not want to tear apart his work or hinder it, for St. Paul says in 1 Timothy 4: 1 that it is a devilish doctrine.

XII. From the church.

63. We do not confess to them that they are the church, nor are they, nor do we wish to hear what they command or forbid under the name of the church. For, praise God, a child of seven years knows what the church is, namely, the holy believers, and the sheep who hear their shepherd's voice. For thus the children pray: I believe a holy Christian church. This holiness is not found in shirts, plates, long skirts, and other ceremonies, which are made up by them about the holy scriptures, but in the word of God and right faith.

XIII How to be justified before God, and of good works.

(64) I do not know how to change what I have taught before and since, namely, that through faith (as St. Peter says) we receive a new, pure heart, and God, for the sake of Christ, our mediator, wants to and holds us to be completely righteous and holy. Even though sin in the flesh is not yet gone or dead, he does not want to count it or know it.

055 And upon such faith, regeneration, and remission of sins, good works follow. And whatsoever is sinful or defective in them shall not be counted sin or defect, even for the same Christ's sake; but man shall be whole.

Erl. (2.) 25, 202-205. sec. 2. Schmalkaldic articles. No. 1226, W. XVI, M5-23L7.

1949

Both according to the person and his works, to be called righteous and holy, and to be, out of pure grace and mercy, poured out and spread abroad upon us in Christ. Therefore we cannot boast much of the merit of our works, when they are considered without grace and mercy, but, as it is written in 1 Cor. 1:31, "He that boasteth, let him boast of the Lord," that is, that he has a gracious God, then all is well. They also say that if good works do not follow, then faith is wrong and not right.

XIV Of monastic vows.

66 Because the vows of the monastery are contrary to the first principal article, they are to be evil. For it is they that Christ says of Matt. 24:5, LZo suva Obrwtus eto. For he that voweth a monastic life, believeth that he leadeth a better life than the common Christian man, and seeketh by his works to help not only himself, but also others to heaven: that is, to deny Christ. And they boast from their St. Thomas that monastic vows are equal to baptism. This is blasphemy.

XV. Of the statutes of men.

67. That the papists say, The statutes of men serve for the remission of sins, or merit salvation, is unchristian, and condemned, as Christ saith [Matt. 15:9.], "In vain do they serve me, because they teach such doctrines, which are nothing, but the commandments of men." aa Htum 1, 14.: Λ. ävorsantium veritutew. Item, that they say it is mortal sin to break such statutes, is not right either.

68. These are the articles upon which I must stand, and will stand, even unto my death, if God wills it; and I know not how to change nor yield therein. But if any man will relent, let him do so according to his conscience.

69 Lastly, there is the pope's jugglery, of foolish and childish articles, as of consecration of churches, of baptisms of bells, of altar-stones, and asking of prayers, which gave to it 2c. Which baptisms are a mockery and scorn of holy baptism, that it should not be suffered.

Seventy, Then consecrate light, palms, cakes, oats, spices, 2c. which cannot be called consecrated, nor be, but is mockery and deceit. And of the innumerable juggleries, which we command their gods to perform, and to perform to themselves, till they be weary of it; we will be unwearied with it.

1227. writing "von der Gewalt und Obrigkeit des Pabsts", compiled by the scholars at Schmalkalden before March 1, 1537; printed 1538.

This writing is an appendix to the Schmalkaldic Articles. The author of it is Melanchthon, who wrote it in Latin. But not the original text of Melanchthon, but the German version prepared by Veit Dietrich.

At the Convention in Schmalkalden, the first translation was "presented to the Estates as an official text and approved and signed by the theologians" (J. T. Müller i. e. S. DXXXVIII). Nevertheless, in the complete editions of Luther's works as well as in the Concordienbuch, the text bears the above inscription, which we have placed above it, even though Veit Dietrich expressly noted in an edition he prepared in 1541: "gestellet durch Herrn Phil. Melanchthonem vnd verdeutschet durch Vitum Dietherich" and Chyträus had this appendix printed in 1571 as a scriptum NAunoUtomk. Yes, Selvecker, because he considered the German to be the original text, added in 1580 to a fine edition of the Concordienbuches a back translation into Latin made from the German, as has already been mentioned in the prefaces to the previous number. In the edition of 1583 he improved this error and included the original Latin text. Our writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1559), vol. XII, p. 283d; in the Jena (1568), vol. VI, Bl. 533d; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 1343; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 230, and in VWalch. The time determination for the adoption results from No. 1237, Z5. We have revised the text according to I. T. Müller, "die symbolischen Bücher der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche," p. 328 ff.

I. First, the pope boasts that by divine right he is supreme over all other bishops and pastors in all Christendom.

002 Secondly, that by divine right he hath both swords; that is, that he may set and depose kings, and ordain temporal kingdoms: 2c.

003 Thirdly, he saith, that in case of loss of eternal blessedness, one is bound to believe these things. And these are the causes that the pope calls himself and boasts that he is the governor of Christ on earth.

(4) These three articles we hold and acknowledge to be false, ungodly, tyrannical, and altogether injurious to the Christian church.

005 Now, that our reason and opinion may be the more truly understood, let us first shew what it means that he boasts that he is supreme by divine right. For thus they mean that the pope is common bishop over the whole Christian church, and, as they call it, ὁ κοινὸς πατριάρχης ὁ παππῶν, that is, by whom all bishops and pastors throughout the world are to be ordained and confirmed, that he alone has right and power to elect, order, confirm, and depose all bishops and pastors. Besides this, he also arrogates to himself the power to make all kinds of laws concerning worship, changes in the sacraments, and doctrine, and he wants his statutes and ordinances to be held equal to other articles of the Christian faith and holy scripture, as they cannot be relaxed without sin. For he wills such authority to be based on divine right and sacred law.

He wants us to prefer it to the holy Scriptures and the commandments of God. And what is still worse, he adds this: All these things should and must be believed at the loss of eternal blessedness.

(6) Therefore, first of all, we wish to indicate from the holy Gospel that the pope may not arrogate to himself any authority over other bishops and pastors by divine right.

7. i. Luc. 22, 25, 26. Christ declares with clear and bright words that no apostle should have any authority over the others. For this was the question among the disciples, when Christ had already spoken of his passion, as they disputed among themselves, who among them should be lord, and Christ after his death should decompose? But Christ punished such error of the apostles, and taught them, that it should not be so, that they should be lords, and have dominion; but that they should be apostles at the same time, and preach the gospel in the same office. Wherefore he saith also, "The worldly kings reign, and the mighty are called gracious lords: but ye are not so: but the greatest among you shall be as the least, and the chiefest as a servant." Here it is seen, when they are contrasted, that he will have no dominion among the apostles.

8. II. As this also appears from the other similitude, where Christ [Matth. 18, 2. f.], in the same discourse of the government, setteth a young child in the midst of the apostles, that he might shew, that, as a child desireth no government, neither is subject to it; so also the apostles, and all that should lead the word, should neither seek nor need government.

9. iii. Joh. 20, 21. Christ sends his disciples at the same time to preach, without any distinction, that one should have neither more nor less authority than the other. For thus he saith, "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you." The words are clear and plain, that he sends each one just as he was sent, so that no one can boast of any special authority or power over the others.

10. IV. Gal. 2, 7. f. St. Paul clearly shows that he was neither ordained, nor confirmed, nor confirmed by Peter; nor does he recognize Peter in any way as if he had to be confirmed by him; and he especially denies this, that his calling is not at all based on St. Peter's authority. Now he is said to have ever recognized Peter as a superior, when Peter would otherwise have received such authority from Christ, as the pope boasts without any reason.

011 Wherefore Paul also saith, that he had preached the gospel freely for a long time, before he had discussed it with Petro and the rest. Item, he saith, "He careth not for them which have the reputation of whom they were. For God does not respect the reputation of persons or men. But unto me they that were of reputation did no commandment.

012 Now because Paul clearly testifies that he did not seek permission of Peter to preach, even when he last came to him, we have a certain doctrine that the ministry of preaching is derived from the common profession of the apostles, and that it is not necessary that all of this one person should have Peter's profession or confirmation.

13. 1 Cor. 3, 6. ff. Paul makes all church servants equal and teaches that the church is more than the servants. Therefore it cannot be said with any truth that Peter had any authority or power before other apostles over the church and all other church servants. For thus saith he, "All things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas:" that is, neither Peter, nor any other ministers of the word, may ascribe to them any authority or supremacy over the church.

014 Let no man burden the church with his own statutes; but let it be said here, that no authority, nor reputation, shall be more authoritative than the word of God. Let not the authority of Cephas be exalted above that of the other apostles, as they used to say at that time, Cephas thus holdeth, who is the chiefest apostle; therefore let Paul and others also so hold. Nay, saith Paul, and taketh off Petro's little hat, that his stature and authority should be higher than that of the other apostles, or of the church.

From the Histories.

(15) The Council of Nicaea decided that the bishop of Alexandria should govern the churches of the Orient, and the bishop of Rome the suburban churches, that is, those which belonged to Rome in the Occident. Here the Roman bishop's power first increased, not by divine but by human rights, as was decreed in the Concilio Niceno. If, then, the Roman bishop had been supreme by divine right, the Council of Nicaea would not have had the power to take such authority away from him and to transfer it to the bishop of Alexandria; indeed, all the bishops in the Orient would have ever desired the bishop of Rome to ordain and confirm them.

16 VII. It has been decided in the Nicene Council that each church may appoint a bishop for itself, in the presence of one or more bishops.

Bishops who lived in the vicinity. This was held not only in the Orient for a long time, but also in other and Latin churches, as is clearly expressed in Cyprian and Augustine. For thus saith Cyprian spist. 4. aã Oornsluun: Therefore it is to be kept diligently according to the commandment of God and the Apostles' usage, as it is kept with us, and almost in all countries, that to the congregation where a bishop is to be elected, other bishops situated near the place are to come together, and in the presence of the whole congregation, who know each one's walk and life, the bishop is to be elected; As we see, then, that in the election of Sabini, our fellow bishop, it also happened that, after the election of the whole congregation and the council of some bishops who were present, he was elected bishop, and the hands were laid upon him 2c.

017 This manner is called by Cyprian a divine manner and apostolic usage, and it is a witness that it was so kept almost in all countries at that time.

(18) Since neither the orãirmtio nor eonkrantio was then sought from the bishop of Rome by the great part of the world, in all the churches of Greece and Latin, it is clear that the church at that time did not give such authority and dominion to the bishop of Rome.

Nineteenth, And such a sovereignty and dominion is altogether impossible. For how could it be possible that one bishop should govern all the churches of all Christendom, or that the churches, so far from Rome, could have all their ministers ordained by one alone?

020 For this is ever certain, that the kingdom of Christ is divided throughout the whole world. Even to this day there are many Christian assemblies of the church in the Orient, which have ministers who are neither ordained nor confirmed by the pope nor his own. Now, since such authority, which the pope, contrary to all Scripture, arrogates to himself, is quite impossible, and the churches of the world have now and then neither recognized nor used the pope for such a lord, it is evident that such authority is not instituted by Christ, and does not come from divine rights.

(21) (VIII) Many conciliar meetings have been called and held of old in which the bishop of Rome did not sit as supreme, as he did at Nicaea and in other places; this is also an indication that the church at that time did not recognize the pope as a supreme ruler over all churches and bishops.

22 IX St. Jerome says: If one wants to speak of power and dominion, je ordis is more than urds, that is, world is more than the City of Rome. Therefore, whether he be the bishop of Rome, or of Eugubia, or of Constantinople, or of Rhegium, or of Alexandria, both dignity and office are the same 2c.

23. X. Item, Gregory writes to the patriarch of Alexandria, and bequeaths to him that he should not call him the supreme bishop; and in the regalia he says: it was offered in the Concilio of Chalcedon to the bishop of Rome that he should be the supreme bishop, but he did not accept it.

24 XI. Lastly, how can the pope be over the church according to divine rights, since the election is with the church, and this has even become customary in time, that the Roman bishops have been confirmed by the emperors.

025 Here are some sayings against us, as Matth. 16, 18: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church. Item [Matth. 16, 19.]: "To you I will give the keys." Item [John 21:16], "Feed my sheep." And the like more. But because this whole business has been diligently and sufficiently traced by ours before, we want to have the same Scriptures raised here, and to answer briefly this time, how the sayings mentioned are to be understood in principle.

026 In all these sayings Peter is a common person, and speaketh not for himself alone, but for all the apostles. This the texts clearly prove. For Christ does not ask Peter alone, but says, "Who do ye say that I am?" And that Christ here speaks to Peter alone, as, "Unto thee will I give the keys," item, "What thou shalt bind," 2c., the same he speaks elsewhere to the whole multitude, "All that ye shall bind upon earth," 2c. Item, in John [Cap. 20, 23.], "Whom ye forgive sin," 2c. These words testify that the keys were given to all together, and that they were all sent to preach at the same time.

027 Of these things it must be confessed, that the keys belong not to one man only, but are given to the whole church, as may be sufficiently proved by clear and certain causes. For as the promise of the gospel belongs certainly and without means to the whole church, so the keys belong without means to the whole church, since the keys are nothing else than the office by which such promise is communicated to everyone who desires it; as then it is evident in the work that the church has power to ordain ministers. And Christ saith in these words, "What ye shall bind," 2c., and signifieth to whom he hath given the keys, namely, to the church: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name." 2c. Item, Christ gives the supreme and final judgment 1) to the church, saying, "Tell the church."

028 From this it follows that in such sayings not Peter alone, but the whole company of the apostles, is meant. Therefore, in no way can such sayings be used as a basis for a special power of authority, which Peter had or should have had before other apostles. But when it is said, "And upon this rock I will build my church," it must be confessed that the church is not built upon the authority of any man, but is built upon the ministry of the confession which Peter makes, namely, that Jesus is the Christ and the Son of God. For this reason he also addresses him as a minister of this ministry, since this confession and teaching is to go within, and says, "Upon this rock," that is, upon this preaching and preaching ministry.

029 Now the ministry of preaching is not bound to any place or person, as the ministry of the Levites was bound in the law; but it is spread throughout the whole world, and is in the place where God gives his gifts, apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, 2c. And if the person does nothing at all to such a word and ministry, commanded by Christ, let him preach and teach it whoever he will. Where there are hearts that believe it and keep it, to them be done as they hear and believe it.

030 In this manner many ancient teachers interpret this saying, not of the person of Peter, but of the office and confession, as Origen, Ambrose, Cyprian, Hilarius, Beda. Now that in other places it is said, "Feed my sheep," item, "Peter, lovest thou me also better than these?" [It does not follow that Peter should have more authority than other apostles, but that he is called to "feed them," that is, to preach the gospel, or to govern the church by the gospel; which applies to other apostles as well as to Peter.]

(31) The other article is even clearer than the first. For Christ gave his disciples only spiritual authority, that is, he commanded them to preach the gospel, to proclaim the forgiveness of sins, to administer the sacraments, and to banish the ungodly, without bodily authority, by the word, and did not command them at all to wield the sword, nor to appoint or take temporal rule, to set kings, or to depose them. For thus saith Christ [Matt. 28:12], Go ye, and teach that they keep that which I have commanded.

1) Here the memorable mistranslation has taken place, which is thought of in the introduction to the previous number: tereulum instead of: sudieiuana.

I have commanded you." Item [John 20:21], "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you."

Thirty-two: Now is the day that Christ was not sent to wield the sword, or to rule in a worldly manner, as he himself saith [John 18:36], "My kingdom is not of this world." And Paul saith [2 Cor. 1:24.], "We rule not your faith." Item ^2 Cor. 10, 4.: "Our armour and weapons of war are not carnal" 2c. Now that Christ in his passion was crowned with thorns, and brought forth in a purple robe, and thus mocked, was all an interpretation, that in time the true spiritual kingdom of Christ should be despised, and his gospel suppressed, and another external kingdom set up instead of it, under the appearance of spiritual power. Therefore the OoQ8tiintio Horüiueii VIII. and the eap. OmQ68, äi8t. 22, and the like other sayings more, are altogether false and impious, that they may maintain that the pope, by divine right, is a lord over the kingdoms of the world. How then, from such false delusion, first terrible darkness came about in the church, and after that terrible destruction and tumult in Europe. For the ministry of preaching was abandoned, and the doctrine of the faith and the spiritual kingdom of Christ was completely extinguished, and the outward character and statutes of the pope were taken for Christian righteousness.

033 After this the popes also came, seizing principalities and kingdoms, installing and removing kings, and plaguing almost all the kings of Europe, especially the German emperors, with unjust excommunications and wars; sometimes so that they might seize the cities of the Welsh country, sometimes so that they might make the bishops of Germany their subjects, and confer the bishoprics themselves, which the emperor alone has the right to confer. Yes, that is more, in the Clementina it says: if the empire stands alone, then the pope is the rightful heir to it.

(34) Thus the pope has not only unrighteously taken upon himself temporal rule, contrary to God's clear command, but has wanted to be like a tyrant over all kings. Although this kind of action on the part of the popes is entirely criminal, it is the most fearful thing about it, that he covers up such wantonness and iniquity with the command of Christ, and the keys point to worldly rule, and are attached to such an ungodly and shameful opinion of the salvation of souls, since he says: "Let the people believe it for the salvation of their souls that the pope has such power from divine rights.

035 Now, because such abominable errors have entirely darkened the doctrine of the faith and kingdom of Christ, it will not suffer in any way that we should be silent concerning it; for it is seen in the work before our eyes what great harm has come to the church from it.

(36) Thirdly, it must also be known whether the pope already has the primacy and supremacy by divine right, that no obedience is owed to those popes who pretend to false worship, idolatry, and false teaching against the gospel. Yea, the more is, that such popes also, and such a kingdom, should be thought anathema and accursed; as Paul plainly saith [Gal. 1:8.], "If an angel come down from heaven, and preach any other gospel than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." And in Acts it is written [Cap. 5, 29.], "obey God rather than men," as the spiritual right themselves say, "A pope who is a heretic is not to be obeyed."

037 The high priest in the law of Moses had the office of the divine rights; yet none were bound to obey when they acted contrary to the word of God, as is seen that Jeremiah and other prophets separated themselves from the priests. So the apostles separated themselves from Caiapha, and owed him no obedience. Now it is a fact of the day that the popes and their followers want to maintain and practice ungodly doctrine and false worship. So also all the vices prophesied of the Antichrist in the holy Scriptures rhyme 1) with the kingdom of the pope and his members.

038 For Paul, when he paints the Antichrist [2 Thess. 2:3], calls him "an adversary of Christ, which exalteth himself above all things that are called God, or God's service, so that he setteth himself in the temple of God, as a god, and pretendeth that he is God. Here Paul speaks of one who reigns in the church, and not of worldly kings; and calls him "an abominable man of Christ," because he will devise another doctrine, and that he will arrogate to himself all these things, as if he did them by divine rights.

039 Now first of all this is true, that the pope reigneth in the church, and hath usurped such dominion under the appearance of spiritual power. For he bases himself on these words, "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." Second, that Pabst's doctrine is contrary to all the ways of the gospel. Thirdly, that he pretends to be God is to be noted in three parts.

1) Müller: "weisgesagt".

(40) First, that he presumes to change the doctrine of Christ and the proper worship instituted by God Himself, and wants to keep his doctrine and his own invented worship as if God Himself had commanded it. Second, that he arrogates to himself the power to bind and release, not only in this temporal life here, but also in that life. Thirdly, that the pope will not suffer the church or any other person to judge him, but that his power shall be over all concilia and the whole church. But this is to make oneself a god, if one does not want to suffer either [the] church or anyone's judgment. In the end, the pope has defended such errors and ungodly beings with unjust violence and murder, so that he has had all those killed who did not keep all moderation with him.

041 Therefore, since this is the case, let all Christians be on their guard against such ungodly doctrine, blasphemy, and unrighteous despotism, but let them depart from the pope and his members or associates, as from the kingdom of antichrist, and curse it, as Christ commanded [Matt. 7:15.], "Beware of false prophets. And Paul commandeth [Gal. 1:8.] that false preachers should be shunned, and cursed as an abomination. 2 Cor. 6:14. he saith, "Pull not ye on the strange yoke with unbelievers. For what fellowship hath light with darkness?" 2c. It is hard to separate oneself from so many countries and people, and to lead a special doctrine. But here is God's command that everyone should be careful and not be in agreement with those who teach unrighteous doctrine, or who intend to maintain it with desolation.

042 Therefore our consciences are well excused and assured. For we see before our eyes the great errors that go into the kingdom of Pabst, and the Scriptures cry out with all their might that such errors are the doctrine of the devil and of Antichrist. The idolatry in the abuse of the masses is evident, which, besides being good for nothing else, are abused for shameful enjoyment and profiteering. The doctrine of penance has been entirely falsified and corrupted by the pope and his followers. For thus they teach: Sin is forgiven for our own works. And attach this to it, that we should nevertheless doubt whether sins are forgiven. They do not teach that sin is forgiven without merit for Christ's sake, and that forgiveness of sins is obtained through faith in Christ.

043 By such doctrine they take away the glory of Christ, and deprive the consciences of right and certain consolation, and deprive the right divine things of their own.

The most important thing is the exercise of faith, which struggles with unbelief and despair over the promise of the Gospel.

044 Likewise they have also obscured the doctrine of sin, and have devised their own statutes, how all sin ought to be told and confessed; from which hath followed many errors, and at last despair.

045 Then they devised their own satisfaction, by which the good pleasure and merit of Christ was also obscured. From this followed the indulgence, which is a lie, and is devised for the sake of money alone. What abuses and abominable idolatries have followed from the invocation of the saints! What shame and vice have come from the prohibition of marriage! How has the gospel been so darkened by the teaching of vows! It has been taught that such vows are righteousness in the sight of God, and merit forgiveness of sins; that therefore the merit of Christ is drawn to the statutes of men, and the doctrine of faith is utterly destroyed.

046 And they have praised their foolish and frivolous statutes for right worship and perfection, preferring them to the works which God requires and ordains of every man in his profession. Now it must not be considered that these are minor errors, for they take away Christ's glory and condemn souls; therefore they must not be allowed to go unpunished.

47 To these errors are added two great and grievous sins. The first is that the pope defends and wants to preserve such errors by force, with unreasonable ferocity and cruel tyranny.

(48) The other, that he takes away the judgment of the church, and will not ordinarily have such religious matters judged. Yes, he wants to be more than all conciliation, and to have the power to tear up and annul everything that has been decided in conciliation, as the canons sometimes impudently state, and the popes have done so even more impudently, as many examples testify.

49. 9. Huasst. 3 The canon saith, No man shall judge the supreme throne: for neither emperor nor priest, neither king nor people, judge the judge. So the pope acts like a tyrant on both sides, that he defends such errors with violence and despotism, and does not want to suffer any judges. And this other thing does more harm than all the madness. For as soon as the church is deprived of its right judgment and knowledge it is not possible that false doctrine or unrighteous worship can be controlled, and therefore many souls must be lost.

(50) Therefore, God-fearing people should well consider such abominable errors of the pope and his tyranny, and first know that such errors are to be fled, and the right doctrine is to be accepted for the glory of God and the salvation of souls. Then, that one should consider what a grave and great sin it is to support the Pope's unjust rage, since so many pious Christians are so miserably murdered, whose blood God will undoubtedly not allow to go unsmelled.

(51) Kings and princes, as the most prominent members of the church, are especially to help and see that all kinds of error are removed, and that the consciences are taught rightly. As God especially admonishes the kings and princes to such an office in Psalm 2, v. 10: "O kings, let yourselves be instructed; and ye judges of the earth, let yourselves be chastened." For this is to be the foremost care of kings and great lords, that they diligently promote God's honor.

052 Wherefore it were ever unreasonable for them to use their power and authority to preserve such abominable idolatry and other innumerable vices, and so miserably to slay the pious Christians.

053 And in case the pope should immediately hold a concilium, how can the church be helped against such pieces, if the pope will not suffer anything to be concluded against him, or others, than those who before by dreadful oaths, even God's word not excepted, are to attend him, to judge in church matters?

(54) But since the judgments in councils are judgments of the church, and not of the pope, it behooves kings and princes not to concede to the pope such arbitrariness, but to see to it that the church is not deprived of the power to judge, and that everything is judged according to the holy Scriptures and the word of God. And just as Christians are obliged to punish all other errors of the pope, so they are also obliged to punish the pope himself, if he wants to flee or resist the right judgment and true knowledge of the church.

055 Therefore, although the pope by divine right has the primacy or supremacy, yet no obedience is to be rendered to him, because he desires to maintain false worship and another doctrine contrary to the gospel: yea, out of necessity he is to be set against as the right antichrist. The errors of the pope, and how great they are, are seen in the day.

(56) This is also how we see the incitement which he uses against the devout Christians. This is the command and word of God, that we should flee idolatry, false doctrine, and unrighteous desolation. Therefore, every pious Christian has important, necessary, and bright reasons enough for not obeying the pope. And such necessary causes are a great comfort to all Christians, against all manner of shame and disgrace, which they lay upon us, that we may give offence, and cause division and dissension.

(57) But those who hold with the pope, and defend his doctrine and false worship, defile themselves with idolatry and blasphemous doctrine, and bring upon themselves all the blood of the pious Christians whom the pope and his followers persecute; they also hinder the glory of God, and the blessedness of the church, because they defend such errors and vices before all the world and all their descendants to their hurt.

Of the power and jurisdiction of bishops.

(58) In our Confession and Apologia we have generally stated what was to be said of church authority. For the gospel gives to those who are to preside over the churches, that they should preach the gospel, forgive sins, and administer the sacraments. And over this it gives them jurisdiction, that those who lie in public vices are to be banished, and those who want to amend are to be released and absolved.

59 Now everyone, even our adversaries, must confess that all who preside over the churches have this command at the same time; they are called pustores or pr68d^tsri or bishops. Wherefore also Jerome speaks with bright words: that 6pi860pi and Pv68d^t6ri are not distinguished, but that all parish rulers are at the same time bishops and priests, and allegories the text of Pauli uä 1Ltum, as he writes to Tito [Cap. 1, 5.], "I left thee therefore at Creta, that thou shouldest appoint the cities to and fro with priests"; and calls such afterwards bishops: "There shall be a bishop of a woman's husband." So Peter and John call themselves priests.

(60) After this Jerome says further, But that one alone should be chosen, having others under him, was done to prevent the division, that one should not take a church here, and another there, and so the church be divided. For in Alexandria (he says), from Marco the Evangelist to Heraclam and Dionysium, the presbyteri have always had one church.

chosen from among them, and held higher, and called sxisooxurri (a bishop); as a

The bishops also choose one of them, who is able, to be their captain, and call him archbishop. For, tell me, what does a bishop do more than any presbyter, without ordaining others to the church office? 2c.

- 61 Here Jerome teaches that such a difference between bishops and pastors is due solely to human order, as is also seen in the work. For the office and command are one and the same, and afterwards ordination alone made the difference between bishops and pastors. For so it was ordained, that a bishop also ordained men to the ministry in other churches.

022 But since by divine right there is no distinction between bishops and pastors or parish priests, if a parish priest ordains in his church some competent persons to the church offices, there is no doubt that such ordination is valid and right according to divine right.

63 Therefore, because the ordained bishops persecute the gospel, and refuse to ordain competent persons, any church in this case has good reason and right to ordain its own ministers.

(64) For where the church is, there is always the command to preach the gospel. For this reason the churches must retain the power to require, elect, and ordain ministers; and such power is a gift actually given to the church by God, and cannot be taken away from the church by any human power. As St. Paul testifies in Eph. 4:8, where he says, "He ascended on high, and gave gifts to men." And among such gifts as are proper to the church, he enumerates pastors and teachers, and hangs upon them to be given for the edification of the body of Christ. Therefore it follows that where there is a true church, there is also the power to elect and ordain church ministers, just as, in case of need, even a bad layman can absolve another and become his pastor. As St. Augustine writes in a history, that two Christians were together in a ship, and one baptized the other, and thereafter was absolved by him.

65 There belong the sayings of Christ, which testify that the keys are given to the whole church, and not to some particular persons, as the text says, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." 2c.

(66) Lastly, this is also confirmed by the saying of Peter, when he saith [1 Cap. 2:9], "Ye are the royal priesthood." These words actually refer to the true church, which, because it is the priesthood

If the Church alone has the priesthood, it must also have the power to elect and ordain church servants.

67 The common custom of the church also testifies to this. For in ancient times the people elected parish priests and bishops, and the bishop, sitting in the same place or in the vicinity, came and confirmed the elected bishop by laying on his hands, and at that time the ordination was nothing other than such confirmation.

After that, other ceremonies were added, as Dionysius recounts several of them. But the same book of Dionysius is a new poem under a false title, just as the book of Clementis has a false title, and is made by a bad boy long after the elements.

069 And after these things were added unto the last, that the bishop said unto them whom he consecrated, I give thee power to sacrifice for the living and for the dead: but this also is not written in Dionysius.

(70) From this it is seen that the church has the power to elect and ordain ministers. Therefore, if the bishops are either heretics or do not want to ordain capable persons, the churches are obligated before God, according to divine law, to ordain pastors and church servants for themselves.

011 Whether this be called disorder or division, let it be known that the ungodly doctrine and tyranny of the bishops are guilty of it. For thus Paul gives Gal. 1:7, that all bishops, who either teach unrighteously themselves, or defend unrighteous doctrine and false worship, are to be counted as wicked men.

(72) Hitherto we have spoken of ordination, which alone made any distinction between bishops and priests, as Jerome says. Therefore, it is not necessary to discuss the other episcopal offices much, since one would want to speak of confirmation, baptism with bells, and other such games, which are used almost exclusively by bishops. But the jurisdiction is still to be discussed.

(73) It is certain that all parish priests should have the common jurisdiction to banish those who lie in public vices, and that the bishops, as tyrants, have taken it to themselves and disgracefully abused it for their own benefit. For the bishops have used them in an unpleasant way, and have plagued the people, either out of avarice or out of some other kind of spite, and have banished them without any prior legal knowledge. But what kind of tyranny is this, that an official in a city should have the power, solely according to his own will, without legal knowledge, to plague and force the people with the ban in this way?

(74) Now they have used such constraint in all manner of things, and have not only not punished the right vices with it, since the condemnation should follow upon them, but also in other small matters, where one has not fasted or celebrated rightly; so that they have sometimes punished adultery, and then also often reviled and defamed innocent people. For because such accusations are very important and serious, no one should ever be condemned without a legal and proper judgment in the case.

75 Since the bishops, as tyrants, have usurped and shamefully abused such jurisdiction, and since there are other good reasons for disobeying them, it is right that this stolen jurisdiction should be taken from them again and given to the parish priests to whom it belongs by Christ's command, and that it should be used properly for the betterment of the people and for the increase of the glory of God.

(Seventy-six) Then there is a zuriseietio in those matters which, according to papal law, belong to the korum seelssiustieum, or ecclesiastical court, as especially matrimonial matters are. The bishops have brought such jurisdiction to themselves only from human order, which is nevertheless not very old, as can be seen from ex 60*ai*66 and Qovslls -lustiniuni that matrimonial matters were at that time handled by secular authority, and secular authority is obligated to judge matrimonial matters, especially where the bishops judge unjustly or are negligent, as the canons also testify.

(77) For this reason, the bishops are not to be obeyed on account of such jurisdiction; and because they have made some unjust statutes in matrimonial matters, and need them in the courts which they possess, the temporal authorities are also obliged, on this account, to appoint such courts differently.

(78) For if the prohibition of marriage between spouses is unlawful, it is also unlawful that, when two are divorced, the innocent party should not marry again. It is also unlawful that where two are divorced, the innocent party should not remarry, and that, in general, all marriages that take place secretly and by fraud, without the knowledge and consent of the parents, should be valid and enforceable. The prohibition of priestly marriages is also unjust.

(79) There are other such things in their statutes, so that the consciences have been confused and troubled, which it is not necessary to tell here, and it is enough that it is known that in matrimonial matters many unjust and unfair things have been commanded by the pope, from which temporal authorities have reason enough to order such courts differently for themselves.

80 Because then the bishops who are attached to the pope have ungodly doctrine and false godliness.

1966 Cap. 15. negotiations for a concilii. W. xvi, 2^7-2390. 1967.

They have defended the ministries by force, and do not want to ordain pious preachers, but help the pope to murder them, and have taken away the jurisdiction from the parish priests, and have used them only like tyrants for their own benefit.

81) Lastly: Because they also act so inequitably and unjustly in matrimonial matters, the churches have great and necessary cause enough that they should not recognize them as bishops. But they, the bishops, should consider that their goods and incomes are endowed as alms, so that they may serve the church and carry out their office the more nobly, as the regula says: Beneficium aatur propter (Mcium).

(82) Therefore they cannot in good conscience use such alms, and thereby deprive the church, which needs such goods for the maintenance of the ecclesiastics, and to raise up learned men, and to provide for some poor, and especially for the appointment of the marriage courts. For there are so many strange cases that a separate court would be needed. But such a court cannot be appointed without the help of these estates. St. Peter speaks s2. Ep. 2:13]: The false bishops of the churches will need goods and alms for their pleasures, and will leave the ministry. Because the Holy Spirit is dreadfully threatening them, the bishops should know that they must also give account to God for this robbery.

1228 The preachers' petition to the Protestant estates assembled in Schmalkalden. February 24, 1537.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 369; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. III6; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 194; and in the Oorp. Rsk., vol. III, 288.

To the most illustrious, noble, highborn princes and rulers, and their kinsmen of the Christian understanding, assembled at Schmalkalden, our most gracious and gracious lords.

1. the grace of God through our Lord Jesus Christ beforehand. Most illustrious, most noble, most highborn sovereigns and princes, most gracious and most gracious lords! Since it is public what costs, work and great peril your churonic and princely graces, together with their kinsmen, are bearing for the preservation of the Holy Gospel, from which it may well be inferred that your churonic and princely sovereigns and other estates seek nothing else in this highly important matter than to promote and spread the glory of God, we hope that your churonic and princely sovereigns, together with their kinsmen, will support our subordinates in this matter. G. will graciously pass our submissive reminder (which also concerns the order of the churches and God's honor), as I then ask in submission that your chur- and F. G. graciously accept this document of ours, which is based on a faithful and simple opinion. For although we know to some extent that in some princes

We are of the opinion that in many towns and cities the ecclesiastics are adequately provided for, and that it is seriously observed that they are provided for, that the parish priests and schools are appointed from church and monastery property, and that the hospitals are improved, so that men must confess that such property is not used for the help of the church in any other way than in a Christian way: Nevertheless, we find that in many places there is a great lack in this, namely, that the ecclesiastics and schools are very poorly provided for, or are not appointed at all and are desolate, and yet not only the authorities, but also private individuals, take possession of monastery and church properties of their liking. Now Your Electoral and Princely Grace sees that especially at this time it is extremely necessary to provide for the churches and schools in such a way that one can have capable persons. In addition, the common people do little of their own accord, and such gifts must be and remain princely eleemosyna. As also the holy Scriptures praise Jehoshaphat and Ezechiam, and several other kings, on account of such provision. And the text speaketh plainly, that it should be done for this cause, that the priests of the doctrine may wait.

(2) Now your electors and princes will find, as we have learned in several places, that something proper is needed for such an order. Your Grace will find in the works, as we have experienced in several places, that something proper is needed for such an order, that this stock of church and monastery goods is well needed for it. Thus these goods, gifts, and endowments are assigned to the church for the preservation of religion, even though many are misused out of error. Therefore, even though the authorities are responsible for these goods and may use them with moderation, they should first of all provide the church offices with the necessary funds. For God has commanded the princes and rulers, above all, to administer, protect, and promote proper church services, and also to ordain the provision of the church servants.

(3) It is also easy to understand how difficult it will be, after the dispersal of these present goods, to bring together new ones, and what damage must first be done before one can again come to another supply.

(4) Therefore, we humbly request that your Electoral and Princely Grace, for God's sake, take heed of the great need in this case. For God's sake, let us heed the great need in this case, and admonish the estates that the church and monastery estates be especially used and preserved for the order of the churches and schools, for the praise of God, for the benefit of the land and the people, and that dispersion (which is not only very harmful to the church, but also to the authorities and the lands) be prevented.

5 God has bestowed upon your electoral and princely graces. Grace in the highest honor that the secular government should have, namely to promote the right doctrine and to protect the right churches, thereby serving many pious Christians throughout the world. This honor and vocation Your Electoral and Princely Graces wish to consider. Grace, and the more diligently preserve the doctrine and churches. We also ask in submission that you graciously understand this simple writing of ours, which we consider necessary for the sake of our conscience. May God always graciously protect your sovereign and princely graces. God always graciously preserve your sovereign and princely Grace for His praise and for their blessedness, and for the protection and comfort of poor Christianity. Date Schmalkalden, on the day of St. Matthew [24 Feb], Anno 1537.

Ew. chur- und prinstl. Grace.

subservient and willing servants prebendaries assembled here.

1229. Joh. Aurifaber's news of the convent at Schmalkalden.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 378; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 1226; and in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 77.

(1) On the fifteenth day of February a meeting was held at Schmalkalden, where the protesting estates were all described for the sake of the council, and the princes and sovereigns, and also the cities, brought their most distinguished theologians with them, as D. Mart. Luthern, Philippum Melancthonem, D. Pomeranum, Martinum Bucerum, Andream Osiandrum, and others in great numbers more. On this day, Emperor Carln sent Matthias Held, Vice-Chancellor, to the protesting Estates, who had taken great action with the Estates on behalf of the Emperor's Majesty; so the Pope also sent his legation there for the Concilii.

2. at this day were in their own persons; Duke John Frederick, Elector, Landgrave Philip of Hesse, Duke Ernst and Francis, Princes of Lüneburg, Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, Duke Philip of Pomerania, Prince Wolf, George and Joachim of Anhalt, Count Gebhard and Count Albrecht of Mansfeld, and the envoys of the imperial cities in large numbers, and on the 6th day of March the electors and princes, also the envoys of the imperial cities, departed from this day.

(3) The theologians at this day also discussed with the greatest earnestness and diligence what they finally wanted to base and maintain in the Concilio, and several articles were written by Martin Luther as a summary of Christian doctrine, and was approved by all the theologians assembled there and signed with their own hand; which booklet then went out in public print in the 38th year and was called the Schmalkaldic Articles.

4th It was also ordered by the sovereigns and princes on this day to the theologians that they should read through the Augsburg Confession and Apology (delivered by Emperor Carln at the Imperial Diet in Augsburg in 1530) again with diligence, and if anything was found in it that was not in accordance with holy divine Scripture, or if they did not teach such things in their churches, that it should be changed, and they, the theologians, signed the Confession and Apology anew with their own hand. This signature took place on the 24th day of Februarii. Martinus Bucerus in particular signed the Augsburg Confession and Apology on behalf of the preaching ministry and churches in Strasbourg.

1230. council of the church of a committee of several cardinals, Pope Paul the Third written and delivered by his command. With a preface and glosses by Martin Luther. 1538.

The Concilium announced by Pope Paul III to Mantua did not take place, because the Duke of Mantua considered a military garrison in the city necessary for the Concilium, and demanded a contribution from the Pope for its maintenance, which the latter refused. Now the pope moved the council to Vicenza, and it was to begin there in May 1538. In order to avert the suspicion that he was not serious about the reformation of the church, he issued an order in 1537 to the cardinals, who had signed the final document, to draw up a council on the improvements to be introduced in the church. In the same year, this writing came into the hands of Johannes Sturm of Strasbourg, who published it (1537) in Latin with notes; a German translation of it had also appeared before Luther began to publish it (Luther's letter to Hausmann of Feb. 23, 1538). In Rome this writing was printed in 1538 under the title: 6onsüium cko srusncknnckn seelssin nu8pieÜ8 l>nuU III. 6on86riptum, but in 1559 it was placed in the incksx libroruru proüiditoruln. It is reprinted in 1s ? 1nt, ruonuin. Irick, tom, II, p. 596. Luther translated the same in February, 1538, and provided it with his preface and glosses. The first edition is entitled: "Ratschlag eins ausschus etlicher Cardinel, Bapst Paulo des namens dem dritten, auff seinen befelh geschrieben vnd überantwortet. With a preface by D. Mart. Luth." Below this a woodcut: three Cardinals sweeping the church with foxtails. Then follow the words, 8ox>Ui8rna 6Ur^8ippi. 8i ruentir8, vtiuru yuock usrum < 11618, ru6ntiri8. At the end: "Printed at Wittemberg by Hans Lufft. M.D.XXXVIII." 4Z quarto sheets.

Jir the same year another edition by the same, in which some printing errors of the first are improved, and added from the title "of the churches". Only the preface is found in the Jena edition (1568), vol.VI, p. 533d, and in the Altenburg, vol.VI, p. 1253. The whole writing in the Wittenberg (1553), vol.I V, p.431d; in the Hallische Theile, p. 443 with the woodcut; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 229; in the Erlangen (1st), vol.25, p. 148, and in the second edition, vol. 25, p. 251. The former Papal Nuncio, Peter Paul Vergerius, after converting to the Gospel, also organized an edition in 1555.

Preface D. Mart. Luth.

I. The pope drags himself along with the poor Concilio like a cat with its kittens. In Germany he will not keep it, at Mantua he cannot keep it (as he pretends); now it shall become Vincent, since it cannot be, and they do not mean it. I fear he will be a Marcolfus, that could nowhere find a tree to hang upon. So the pope cannot find a place where he would have a concilium. If my advice were valid, I would almost advise that the holy people be satisfied with the concilium; they cannot suffer one, and will not make one, unless they can do what they want inside. What then are they accused of? They cannot let themselves be reformed, nor do they want to, that is known for certain. And yet, if it came to the Concilium, they would have to give feather or let hair, even their own patron, as emperor, kings, princes, etc., as they burned themselves in the Costnitz Concilium, and were well aware of it.

002 For if they should be found, even in the smallest part, guilty or false, the pope would fall with the crown and keys, and this terrible cry would go out against them, that the pope and the Roman church were in error and wrong. That would be death and hell for such a high majesty, which has so far stood by such an article that the pope and his see or church cannot err, but what he does and says is an article of faith, to be believed by all Christians at the loss of their blessedness. Now if he should be punished in error in a little, he would already be suspected in all things, as his own rights say, Hui his! malus, hisper prnesumitur malus, who once a rogue is invented, he remains in all suspicion. So it would all fall hereafter.

003 Wherefore the necessity of their majesty requireth that they hold no concilium, in which they may question or debate, whether the Roman see hath erred, or is in the wrong, or may err; but they must do as Marcolfus did, and find no city in which they will suffer a concilium or reformation. And they must not hold a council, or hold one which they have power to hold, and in which nothing is done but what pleases them; as the Lateranense was at Rome, under Popes Julio and Leone, in which Pope Julius was highly praised, and nothing else was done.

004 For it is written of the Antichrist, Dau. 11:16, that he should be such a king, that he should do as he pleaseth, that is, he should be God, subject to no law, but be lord and master of all rights, as his flatterers sing unto him in their writings, 8m jubeo, sie volo, sit pro ratione voluntas. M-. Omniu Jura suut in seriuio peetoris esus; that is, Thus will I, thus will I; my will shall be the right; and: All the rights are in the treasury of his heart. As we see, then, that the pope's rule is such that 1) he does what he wills, without right, against right, above right, straightway according to his will. So that he also in his decree Ouneta per munäum cries out that the holy scripture is under his chair, and he not under the holy scripture.

5. Since he now fetches with such majesty in the grant 2) and is an old usage and custom, how should he then let himself be reformed, and put under the law, or let himself be instructed by someone who until then has been above all? And hath not been able nor willing to suffer any to be judge nor master, but hath made himself judge of all the world, even of angels, as the Bulla Clementis testifieth, when he commanded the angels of Paradise, as a governor of Christ, that they should lead the pilgrims that die on the journey to Rome into Paradise. Speaks to this: Nolmnus, we would not have it that such pilgrims should be led into hell by any means 2c.

1) So the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. Erlanger: "da".

2) "Warranty"

- Possession.

(6) Not content with this, he has always usurped the other part of the power, that is, the earthly or imperial authority, persecuting emperors and kings, cursing them, removing and installing them, beheading and expelling some of them, according to all his will, against God and right. And now also his learned flatterers saw fit to call the pope no more Pabst, nor Lumwuin Uontillvom (as of old), but the prince and Uoutillcsi" Naximuii, which names of old the heathen Roman emperors had, as Julius, Nero 2c. For now they no longer speak thus: the pope is at Rome, but: kriuveps sst aä Hrdsm, the prince or emperor is in his imperial city Rome. Thus, after they have long been emperors by deed, they now also begin to use the names and titles of the heathen emperors. For they want to be it alone, God in heaven, emperor on earth. And their cardinals will no longer be called cardinals, but oonsuls. For they have become legates in the provinces, as the pagan oousules.

007 If then all this filth should be shaken in a free council, what a stench should arise there? They are afraid of this, and seek the most wondrous plots, and yet hope that it will not be noticed. For they have now thrice maddened the Concilium. They have let the Roman court's reformation go out, so that the Council (if it had to go without their will) would not find anything to reform in Rome, because they have spoken such good words (impudent lies!) about the reformation as they want to reform themselves, just as if it were still the previous time, when people willingly believed their letters and words, before they knew their flesh. But because such a time is over, and they are known to be impudent liars before all the world, it is almost ridiculous, and a fine carnival play, that they still continue to go about in the same disguise, and think that one does not know them, but that one will (as before) always believe what they lie. No, it is said: It is finished that one roasts bacon on coals; it does not help, brother, that you are painted, one knows you nevertheless.

008 But now they have devised a rank of the whole reformation of the church, as this booklet fox-foxes, that, if such a lie be believed, henceforth there shall be no concilium is necessary. For as the papal court was reformed before by that reformation, so now, with this booklet, the whole church is reformed. And even if the concilium had to be held (of which they are so dreadfully afraid), it would still have nothing more to reform in the church, because the pope has already begun to do so. Therefore the concilium and meeting would be nothing else than that one would tell the other, and then they would go home again, because everything has happened that a concilium might desire.

9th But look at the desperate boys, how they reform the church with fox-tails; where it hits the pope and cardinals, they give everything to the pope, and neither pope nor cardinal has never done anything wrong, are all pious, shall have what they have, and even more, stay as they are 2c. Who then is reformed? The great rogue no one. For if the pope and cardinals are pious, their servants are also pious; for who will have done it, if the pope and cardinals have done nothing? So then all the misfortune was done by the wretched nobody, and this reformation is nothing but nobody's reformation. Well, one should not curse (that is true), but one must pray that God's name be hallowed and honored, the pope's name be profaned and cursed, along with his god the devil, that God's kingdom come, and the kingdom of the last Christ perish. Such a paternosteric curse may well be prayed, and should be prayed by every Christian, because the last arch-villains at the end of the world, pope, cardinals and bishops, so shamefully, maliciously, wantonly blaspheme and mock our dear Lord and God. LxsurZe vomins, Huai-o odäormis? ste. 8oä vsniono vsnit, and should they become nonsensical!

Advice of a committee of some Cardinals, Pope Paulo of the name of the Third from his order written and delivered.

(1) Most Holy Father, we are so far lacking that we cannot express how great, great thanksgiving all of Christendom owes to the Almighty, Most High God appointing you at this time to be a pope and shepherd of his flock, and also to give you such a mind and spirit.

so that we cannot even with any thought attain the thanks which Christianity owes to God for it.

a) Ei, what a seriousness is here the holy chair! is always pity that one can believe such Schälken and liars nothing more, if it could lament someone.

(2) For the Spirit of God, by whom the powers of the heavens were created, as the prophet saith, hath determined by thee to put a hand under the church of Christ, which is now not only tottering, but even nigh falling to pieces, and, as we see, to raise it up to the former majesty, 1) and to restore it to its former respectable and glorious estate. And of this divine counsel and decree we may have actual notice, since thy holiness required us to it, and commanded that we should (considering neither thine own, nor ours, nor any man's own benefit) denounce unto thee the grievous, great pestilences and abuses, wherewith the church of God hath all along been laden, and especially this court of Rome. It has happened that the great, dangerous, pestilential plague has quietly and singularly broken in and taken over, and brought the great fall and decline to Rome, as we see.

b) For they are so subtle, secret, and invisible, that the pope could not see them, if these holy cardinals did not show them, yet the geese and ducks cry foul over them in all the world.

003 And after thy holiness, taught by the Spirit of God, who, as Augustine writes, in the hearts of men, without sound and tumult of words, well knoweth and hath known the beginning of this calamity and great hurt, that certain popes, having itched ears, as St. Paul saith, they themselves, not that they learned of them what they should do, but that by their deceit and guile they devised a way to do what they would. And thus it came to pass, that in all great lords there were hypocrites, as the shadow is in the flesh, and the truth came hardly to their ears, that immediately there came forth doctors, who taught that the pope of all fiefs was a lord. And since every lord has the power to sell his own, it follows from this that the pope cannot be guilty of some sin. So that the mere will of the pope is a rule<sup>c</sup> and guide of all his lords.

1) Here the Wittenberg edition has the gloss which is missing from the first edition, "Ja stinckt euch dz mau! darnach."

2) Instead of "them" in the issues, it should probably read "him" (the Spirit of GOD).

3) from which it follows that he may do what he pleases without hesitation, as the Latin proverb reads: tzuoã lidet, reads what one pleases, that he may also do.

c) Rule) Fire here, these cardinals have become heretics, who condemn such an old article of faith, on which, after all, the papacy stands. Oh that you boys 2c.

(4) From this well, most holy father, have sprung all the abuses in the church of God, as the heroes from the Trojan horse, and so many grievous pestilences, from which, as is to be seen, they lie very near sick unto death, and these rumours have been heard very near even among the heathen and the Turk. And this your holiness shall certainly believe us, that they also chiefly ridicule our Christian faith and religion for the cause, so that for our sake, for our sake (we say) the name of Christ is blasphemed among the heathen.

005 But unto thee, most holy Father, and verily, most holy Father, after thou hast been taught by the Spirit of God, after thou hast put forth all diligence above thy former common wisdom, that thou shouldest heal the sickness of the church of Christ, which is committed unto thy care, and restore it to health, thou hast well seen that the medicine must be raised up, <sup>d</sup>) whence the sickness sprang in the first place.

d) raise) For God's sake, say an Our Father for these Cardinals, so that they do not think differently, for people do not understand such Welsh and false Wallitzschier <sup>4</sup>) but firmly hope that one does not know their larvae, and believe what they say, as they have been accustomed to until now.

006 Thou hast followed the doctrine of St. Paul, and wilt be a servant and a steward, and not a lord, and be found faithful and diligent of the LORD.

007 Hast also followed the servant in the gospel, whom his lord hath set over his servants, to give them their hire in due season.

008 And for this cause thou hast determined with thyself to abstain from that which is not proper for thee, neither wilt thou do that which is not proper for thee. <sup>e</sup>) Wherefore thou hast called us unto thee, which, though we be inexperienced, and unfit for such great things, yet are not a little unskilful, 5) and eager for the praise and honour of thy holiness, and especially for reformation and rebuilding.

3) So the Wittenbergers. Erlanger: "which".

4) "Wallitzschier" Bellitschier, good reputation, good appearance. Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. XXII, 298.1677.

5) Instead of: "uninclined" should probably read "inclined".

of the Church of Christ, and therefore commanded us with all earnest speeches to gather up all abuses and report them to thee.

(e) (not due) What then is this "not," since the pope is a lord over emperor and all? C. Ounota eto.

009 Thou hast also highly and faithfully reminded us that we would have to give an account of this matter to God Almighty if we were unfaithful or diligent in this. And that all things among us might be done the more freely, and be reported to thee, thou hast counted us free from the oath, that we might be bound to thy holiness, and hast bound us under penalty of excommunication, that we should not or would not tell any other of these things.

010 So we have been obedient to thy commandment, and have gathered together in the shortest possible time the diseases and pestilences, and the remedies which we of our little understanding have devised. But thou, according to thy goodness and wisdom, wilt supply and execute all that we, with our little understanding, have devised. But that we may compose all things within a certain bounds, seeing that thy holiness is a prince of these countries, subject and subjected to the jurisdiction and authority of the Roman church, and also a bishop of the whole common Christian church, and also a bishop of Rome, we have not refrained from speaking of those things which belong to the principality and supremacy of the Roman church, which principality we perceive to be best governed and made manifest by thy prudence and wisdom. For this reason we want to attack only those things that concern the office of the bishop<sup>h</sup> whole common Christian church, and also some things that belong to the bishop of Rome.

f) Just as the court of Rome was recently reformed, so this reformation is also a serious matter.

011 Now this, most holy Father, we must put before all things and decree, as Aristotle says in Politicis, that just as in every police and commune, so also in this spiritual administration of the church of Christ, we have this law and right before all, that, as much as possible, the laws and common rights and be held. And that we take it for this<sup>g)</sup> and respect that it is not due nor proper to us in law, and contrary to the ordinance of the

The right to dispense otherwise than for urgent and necessary cause. For no more dangerous nor more harmful custom can be introduced into any police force than that one does not keep the rights and laws, and lets come in contempt and dishonor, and does not want to consider that our ancestors have the l'sZs8 and rights sacred and unbreakable have wanted to have kept, and their power vsnsrariärQ st äivinarn, venerable and divine called.

(g) If I knew thee not (said the lion to the wolf), I should be afraid of thee myself.

(12) Thou knowest all this, most pious Pontiff, and hast now long since read it among philosophers<sup>h</sup> and theologians.

(h) Philosophers) For the Scriptures are of no use in the matter.

013 But this we consider to be not only the nearest to the article next mentioned, but also much more important, greater, and more, than the article mentioned, that it is by no means proper for the pope and Christ's vicars and governors, in the use of the power of the keys, we say of the power given to the pope by Christ, to seek the enjoyment of money, <sup>i</sup>gain, and profit. For this is Christ's command: Ye have received it freely, ye shall give it freely.

i) Money) Hold this, and see where pope, cardinals, bishops, priest, and monk abide with their splendor. But one must speak thus, that the Reformation may be esteemed in earnest. That you boys 2c.

014 When therefore all these things are first ordained and established<sup>k</sup>, then let thy holiness take the care of the church of Christ, that she may have many ministers, by whom she may provide such pastoral care. These ministers are all clergy and clerics who are commanded to minister, especially the priests, and most of all the parish priests, and above all the bishops. Therefore, if this administration is to proceed properly, diligence must first be taken to ensure that these ministers are competent and skilled in the office for which they are responsible.

(k) erect) This is when the devil goes to heaven.

(l) proficient) That is, to be curtsians, legates, and Roman crockery.

015 The first abuse in this part, action, and commerce, is the ordination and consecration, and before the priests, in which there is no care nor diligence, that at many ends the most unlearned and inexperienced, who are of the least birth and arrival, who are of evil manners and youths, are admitted to the ordination, and most of all to the priesthood, and I say, to the character and sign, which most properly signifies, signifies, and resembles Christ<sup>m</sup>; therefore countless troubles come, hence contempt for the clergy; for this cause the reverence for the divine service is not only diminished, but almost entirely extinguished. Therefore we think it best that your holiness first ordain in this city of Rome two or three prelates, learned and pious, honest men, who have the command to ordain and consecrate clerics.

(m) similar) Here be taught, O man, that character makes priests like Christ, similar and images; other Christians may be like the devil, because they have not the priestly character.

016 That thy holiness also command all bishops, with censures and excommunications, to be well aware thereof in their dioceses.

017 Neither will thy holiness suffer any man to be ordained and consecrated, except by his bishop, or with the permission of the decrees of Rome, or of his bishop.

(18) That every bishop also keep a magister, by whom the young clerics, according to the laws, are both instructed and taught in arts and manners.

019 There is also another abuse which is exceedingly great, which is the granting of spiritual fiefs.

020 And especially of the pastorates, and above all others of the dioceses, in which this custom has broken down and become prevalent, that [one] thereby helps and serves the persons to whom such ecclesiastical fiefs are conferred, 1) but not the host and church of Christ.

021 Wherefore, if it be desired to confer such ministries, and especially the bishoprics, diligence should be taken, and care should be taken that they be lent to pious, upright, and learned men; and for this very cause, that they by themselves and by their own persons may administer and maintain such ministries as they are bound to do.

(22) That such pastorates also be lent and conferred upon those who are likely to have their residence and essential<sup>1)</sup> maintenance with their parishioners. Therefore one shall not lend to a whale a spiritual fief in Hispania or Britain, or again. And this is to be observed, both in the granting of fiefs which have been disposed of by death and by resignation, in which case only he who resigns and cedes such fiefs, and no one else at all, is to be benefited. If

1) To make sense, we inserted "one" and put "lent" instead of: "lend".

Now if one or two pious honest men were appointed to such things, to pardon the ecclesiastical fiefs in a useful way, 2) then we consider that it would have been well done.

n) Essential) How is this to be done? Shall the cardinals and prelates return the stolen parishes? That would be terrible<sup>1)</sup> But what harm is it that one says so, even if one does not mean it.

023 There is yet another abuse, when spiritual fiefs are bestowed, or when they are given to others by renunciation and cession. For this abuse has crept in secretly, that those who have renounced such fiefs are deprived of their use, enjoyment, and interest, and sometimes even of all fruits and revenues. <sup>o)</sup>

o) They, the popes and cardinals, have invented such 3) romance themselves, and will probably remain unreformed.

024 And in this case it must be observed, that for no other cause, and by no other right, can a pension and interest be reserved and made, but for alms, for <sup>p</sup>godly exercises, and for poor and needy people. For the pensions and incomes are as much attached and dependent upon the ecclesiastical fiefs as the body of the soul, <sup>q)</sup> for which reason the ecclesiastical fiefs are by their nature due to him who holds the ecclesiastical fief, that he may honestly have his maintenance from the ecclesiastical fiefs according to his estate; that he may also endure and bear the expenses of worship, and of keeping the churches and houses of God in a state of building. 'And what is left over from all this, he shall invest in pious usus, that is, in godly practice. For this is the nature and inherent type of the same pension and income.

p) Alms) Cardinal and Curians to fatten; is that reformed, if one suffers such reservations and does not even reject them? O cardinals, how you disgrace yourselves!

q) Soul) To such bodies the pope is the soul to which they all cling.

r) How the cardinals of Rome keep the churches, so that not a mouse dwells in them.

025 But as in natural things there are some things which are contrary to common course and manner, as men and other beasts with two heads, and other monsters more: so also the pope, the imivrsulis äispsnsukor, that is, a common steward of the church goods, when he seeth that the part of the goods which is to be turned into godly use, is better turned into one

2) Maybe: "lend"?

3)

Erlanger:

"Solchs".

If a pope wants to turn to another godly custom, he may do so without doubt. For this reason, a pope may justly set a pension and interest on an ecclesiastical fief in order to help a poor person,<sup>s</sup> a cleric, and a clergyman, so that he may be able to maintain himself the more honestly. For this reason it is a great abuse to reserve and reserve all use of ecclesiastical fiefs, and to take away everything that should be given and given for the worship and entertainment of the owner of the ecclesiastical fief.

s) Yes, I thought the pope wanted to be the soul of the pensions and remain unreformed. Now reform, that God may punish you, you healed boys!

(26) It is indeed a great abuse to give pensions and interest to rich clerics, who can otherwise maintain themselves usefully and honestly from the pensions they have. <sup>1)</sup> For this reason, both of these abuses should be abolished.

(t) Except when the pope does it, who is justly angry when someone else does it, and does not let him do it alone.

(27) There is also another abuse in the confusion and exchange of ecclesiastical fiefs, which is done with such engagements, contracts, and agreements, all of which are simoneous, and directed to nothing else, but only to disgraceful gain").

(u) Gain) For there the pope is gone again, who should do it alone with his cardinals.

(28) In all cases, we must also put an end to the abuses that have now become rampant in this Roman court through the cunning of some of the learned. For although it is provided in law and forbidden that no one may bequeath and bequeath spiritual fiefs to another in his will and last will, in view of the fact that the spiritual fiefs are not of the testator and testament maker, but of the church<sup>x</sup>. And so that such goods may be kept for the benefit of all the pious in common, and not for the exclusive and private use of one alone, human, but not Christian, modesty and discretion have nevertheless invented many wonderful ways and means by which one acts contrary to this right, and thereby mocks and despises it. For they hand over the bishoprics and other ecclesiastical fiefs, first of all to our rsZrssZu, that is, <sup>y</sup>) that they again have an access to them.

1) So the Wittenbergers: Erlanger: "these".

They are able to reserve and reserve to them also the fruits and uses; so they also heap upon them the reservation and reserve of administration and management, and by this means make him a bishop who can have neither episcopal power nor right; and again, give episcopal power and right to him who is not a bishop. Therefore let your holiness see how far this flattery is broken down, and that at last it will come to pass that every one will do what he lusts and desires. Now what is all this but to make him an heir to spiritual fiefs?

x) Church) This is the pope, he alone shall have it, so then the church is reformed.

y) that is) They sell and barter with the bishumens, as the rogues with dice.

029 Besides these things, they have invented another deceit, namely, that, when the bishops are given and decreed more unfit <sup>z</sup>coadjutors at their request, neither are they themselves; that it may be clearly seen (unless one will shut his eyes) that by this means heirs are made ecclesiastical fiefs.

(z) more unproficient) For proficient ones are well enough, but who will find unproficient ones?

(30) Item, Pope Clement has<sup>a</sup> again denied the old right that the priests' children of their fathers should not possess ecclesiastical fiefs, so that the common goods of the church would not in this way become their own and private. But nevertheless one also dispenses<sup>b</sup> and imposes in these honest rights.

a) Clemens) Ah, the pious pope! why does one not follow such a pope who has reformed the church so finely?

b) dispensit) That is, one reforms how and what one wants. They say that clipping is part of the trade.

(31) We do not wish to conceal the fact, if any man of understanding can see for himself the truth, that no other thing has made this disgrace and apostasy of the clergy more, from which so much revolt and indignation have arisen, and still others arise and follow, for this taking away of the spiritual and ecclesiastical goods, pensions, and incomes for their own use. Before this, all men hoped that these abuses would be corrected. But now they have despaired of it. <sup>c</sup>) and speak almost evil of this chair.

c) despairing) There it will probably remain, because such cardinal reformation strengthens such despairing with such Roman, shameful, false words.

(32) After this there is another abuse in the expectation and reservation of ecclesiastical fiefs, so that one also gives cause to desire other people's deaths and to hear them gladly. For by this rank 1) they close the way to those who are more worthy of such ecclesiastical fiefs, if they are transferred, and give cause to quarrel and to right, and we consider that all these abuses should be stopped.

(33) Another abuse has also been invented and fabricated by the above-mentioned trickery<sup>d</sup>. For some ecclesiastical fiefs are called in the right, and are also irwoinxmtibilia, which do not suffer each other. Now our forefathers, by and with the interpretation of the name inooinxatidilin, wanted to admonish us that these should not be conferred on one alone. Now, however, this is also dispensed with, and it is not only in two or more other ecclesiastical fiefs, but also, which is worse, in many bishoprics. Because this custom has become so widespread for the sake of avarice, it is rightly abolished, first of all, that one should not lend a lot of bishoprics<sup>e</sup>one.

d) List) Neither the pope nor the cardinal has done this, nor do they yet; therefore such reformation does not concern them; the king of Callicut has done it, and the cuckoo of Taprabona, they are reformed here.

e) bishopric) because to the pope alone they should remain eomputidiliu.

034 What shall we say of the ruionidus, and jointure to one person all their life, that they pretend that it should not hinder, though the spiritual fiefs be given much to one only, from that two or more fiefs are joined together; should not this be a vain deceit of right?

(35) Another abuse has also become prevalent, that the most reverend cardinals<sup>f</sup> are lent bishoprics, or commendated and invested, not only one, but many. And in this abuse, most blessed Father, methinks there is much that is wonderful in God's Church: first, that the office of cardinal and the office of bishop are ineoinxutidiliu, and do not suffer each other. For it belongs to the cardinal's office to assist your holiness, and to keep its essence with her, to govern the whole common Christian church. <sup>g</sup>) But the bishop's office is to feed his flock and sheep, which he does not do rightly or well,

1) Wittenberger: ranck; Erlanger and Walch: "rank". We have followed the former reading.

Nor how he may do, that he may have his way with his sheep, as a shepherd with his flock.

f) Alas, the poor cardinals, where will they go before this reformation? Help, infernal 2) Cardinal of Mainz, that it not become serious here, along with your peers unpleasant.

g) Hui, brother! do not deny yourself to death, you can still feed well.

(36) Moreover, holy father, this abuse is most injurious by way of example. <sup>h</sup>) For how can this holy see judge and correct other people's abuses, if abuses are tolerated in its noblest members? We also hold that because they are cardinals they should be permitted, not the more, but the less, for the sake of such causes, to act contrary to common rights, ordinances, and statutes. For the life of cardinals should be a law and rule for others to follow.

(h) I see it in thine eyes, how great is the earnestness thereof.

(i) law) be stinginess rule.

037 Neither should men follow the Pharisees and hypocrites, which speak, and do not; but the Lord Christ, who began to do, and to speak after that. Furthermore, this custom also does harm in the counsels of the church. For this liberty is a nourishment and abstinence of avarice. In addition to this, the cardinals are stingy with kings and princes about bishoprics, to which they are so attached that they are not allowed to speak their mind and opinion freely in councils; indeed, even if they could do it well and would like to<sup>i</sup>they would still allow themselves to be deceived by their weakness to speak right. For this reason, God wished that this custom be abolished, and that the Cardinals be so provided for that they might live honestly in their position, and that one might have as much income as the other. Which we think would easily be done, if we would turn from the service of mammon to the service of Christ alone. <sup>m</sup>)

(k) gladly) for that the great Satan sternly guards them. l) honestly) that one would have four kingdoms.

(m) Yes, there it is, "if we would"; but the cardinals and popes say, We will not do it, as he said at Salzburg, and they all say. What then is this Reformation? A Roman larva, which has been wickedly belarved, and has shamefully betrayed itself.

2) In the Wittenberg: "hellscher"; in the Erlangen: "höllischer". The latter is meant, however, but it is written: "hellscher" == hällischer, that is, Halle.

038 If then the abuses which have been touched were corrected, which belong to and serve to ordain ministers, by whom, as instruments, both worship may be well directed, and the Christian people honestly instructed, governed, and guided in the Christian life, it would be necessary to take hold of the things which belong to govern the Christian people.

039 In which part, most blessed Father, this abuse must first be abolished before all others, that first the bishops before all others, and then the pastors do not dwell from their churches and parishes; before the bishops, as they have said to me: for they are the bridegroom<sup>n</sup> of the churches which are commanded them. For, dear eternal God, what sight can be more wretched and more miserable to a Christian man who is scouring the lands, than that the churches should become so desolate? For almost all shepherds have departed from their flocks, and the parishioners are all ordered to the hirelings. Therefore a great punishment should be inflicted on the bishops before all others, and after that on the parish priests who have departed from their flocks. And this punishment was to be inflicted not only by censure and banishment, but also by not allowing the absent bishops and parish priests to receive the rent and interest, so that the bishops would receive permission from your holiness and the parish priests would receive permission from the bishops for a short time. <sup>o</sup>) Read the common laws and some conciliar decrees and ordinances, in which this provision was made, that the bishop should not be allowed to be away from his church for longer than three Sundays or weeks.

(n) Bridegroom) This is what the devil wanted, that bishops should be the bridegroom of the churches, which is Christ alone. Behold, how instructed is the pope!
in the Scriptures!

(o) Permission) Yes, if that hole is open, then the Reformation is very much fucked.

(40) This is also an abuse, that so many most worthy cardinals do not have their being in this Roman court, and do none of the offices<sup>p</sup> that are due to the cardinals. For this reason, though perhaps not all, for we think it good that some cardinals have their being in their countries, for by them, as by some roots, interwoven and distributed through the whole of Christendom, the peoples, rations, and regions are preserved under and at this Roman see; yet it would be good that at least the greater number of cardinals be required by your holiness at the Roman court to have their being all there. For by this means, that the cardinals should arrange their office, so that the would also promote the honor of the Roman court. And thus would be fulfilled and repaid that which had been broken off and withdrawn from the Roman court by the withdrawal of many bishops who had turned to their churches.

(p) Offices: How can they all do their office at Rome? For there is no more monastery to eat, but they must seek their office in other countries, which is to eat monasteries. Therefore it is right here that cardinals should take root in all Christendom, and hold it under the pope.

q) Behold, behold, the desperate knaves want to have everything by the Rom!

(41) There is also still a great abuse, and in no way to be suffered and tolerated, in which all Christendom is angry, from which hindrance [in the matters] which come before the bishops in the government of their flocks, most of all to punish, amend, and atone for the malefactors<sup>1</sup>. <sup>1</sup>) For first of all, wicked men, before the clergy and clerics, make themselves free and exempt from their bishop's and ordinaries' compulsion to judge by many ways. Afterwards, if they are not exempt and freed, they soon have recourse to the office of penitentiaries or dataries, at which ends they soon find an opening to remain unpunished, and, which is worst of all, for this very reason, if they only give money. For, most holy father, this affliction grieves the Christian people so much that words cannot reach them.

r) Who does this other than the pope and cardinals who do not want to be reformed?

042 We beseech thy holiness, by the blood of Christ<sup>s</sup>, that he hath redeemed, washed, and cleansed his church and congregation, let such abuses cease; let shame and vice be put away. For if this some access were given in some commune, country, and kingdom, it would soon fall off the neck and go to the ground, and might stand in no way longer. And shall we think ourselves just and good, if we bring such abominations into Christendom?

s) Thus shall you smear the mouths of the barbarians. Again, blasphemous liars, God blasphemes you. For whoever hears such words, and does not know you, should believe that you are in earnest. But you have told such lies and oaths many hundred years too many; you are no longer believed.

043 Another abuse in monastic orders must also be changed, corrected, and remedied, because so many of them have come into such disrepair and disorder that they greatly annoy the seculars by it, and with the example

1) Inserted by us to give sense. In the first single edition: "aus den Verhinderung". Erlanger: "from the prevention".

Do very much harm. Therefore we consider that all conventual orders should be abolished, not by doing violence to anyone, but by forbidding the taking in of new monks, for in this form they would soon be destroyed and leave, and pious monks and clergymen would be appointed in their place. Now, however, we consider that all the boys who have not yet taken profession and monastic vows should be driven out of their monasteries.

44. In our opinion, this should also be improved, and a diligent eye should be kept on the appointment of preachers and confessors from the brethren, so that, first of all, their superiors should have good diligence, that they should be competent and skilled for this purpose. Next, they are to be presented to the bishops, who are charged with the care of souls and the church above all others, to be interrogated and examined by the bishops themselves or by skilled men; they are then to be admitted to such matters by their will.<sup>t</sup>

t) Will) But once reformed, yet do what they will. There will always be "reservations" that they will be reformed, and yet remain unreformed.)

045 Most holy Father, we have said, that in no way shall it be fitting or fitting to suffer in the use of the keys, and in matters of confession and penance to seek some profit of the confessor; in which we have the firm word of Christ, "Ye have received freely, ye shall give freely." Now this concerns not only your holiness, but all who are partakers of your power. Therefore we would gladly have it observed by the papal legates and nuncios. For just as the custom, which has now gained the upper hand, does dishonor to this see, and makes the common people mad and grieved, so also, if it were directed to correction, it would be honest to this see, and the common people would be wonderfully improved thereby.

(46) Another custom also afflicts Christendom in the nuns and nuns' maidens who are cared for by the friars of the convent, since in many convents public disgrace of "God is done with all male vexation. Therefore, let your Holiness take the same care from all the friars of the convent, and order it either to the ordinaries, <sup>v</sup>) or to others, as it is deemed most convenient.

(u) God's disgrace) This is bad to translate. But he means so much that many nunneries are public whorehouses, when they should be God's own brides; as they well know how things are in Rome, etc., but do not intend to improve anything seriously.

(v) ordinaries) AIS the best disgrace can cause, neither the monk<sup>u</sup>.

1) This gloss is missing from the Wittenberg edition.

(47) It is also a great and pernicious abuse, before the most ungodly and unchristian disputations take place in Italy and in the French lands, where many teachers and philosophers teach the ungodly nature.<sup>w</sup> Even if some are godly and Christian, they are still very evil and dishonest, and act with no reverence for the common people. For this reason we thought it best that the bishops in the places where universities and high schools are located should be commanded to admonish the teachers and reading masters who read, so that they do not teach and instruct the young people in ungodly matters, but that they show them in questions concerning God, the creation or eternity of the world, or the like, how weak and small the natural light is, and instruct them in godliness, religion, and the fear of God<sup>x</sup>.

(w) Give thanks, ye confess, that ye have so ruled, until epicuri preachers have become, whom ye yourselves rather hear than the gospel.

(48) Likewise, they did not permit public disputation on such questions, nor on such theological matters, which are truly held in great contempt by the common people, but that such matters should be disputed in secret, but not in public. 2) pkvmvis guaskitinnibus and natural questions and matters. This should also be ordered in all other cities, especially in the most excellent cities, where such disputations are held.

(49) The same diligence should be applied to the printing of books, and all princes should be told to see to it that all the books in their lands and dominions are not printed from time to time. And the ordinaries should be ordered to keep an eye on this. Because children in schools are now taught the Colloquia Erasmi,<sup>y</sup> in which there is much that instructs the young and unrepentant in godlessness, it should be forbidden to read this book and others like it in schools.

y) Erasmi) Yes, he must have done it. Would to God he were alive, and pay you shameful knaves, and show how godly you have improved young and old with words and works.

050 Whereupon, as much as it concerns thy servants to instruct, whom thou needest for the supply of the whole common Christian church, even to administer the same, one must keep an eye on the gratuities and indulgence should not be given, if they also left their monastic vows, so that they committed themselves against God; so they should not be allowed and indulged to have ecclesiastical fiefs and administration, and to govern churches.

2) We suppose that instead of "noo" should be read: "of".

z) Apostates) Here he does not mean the Lutherans, whom he does not call so honestly, but whom the pope has shorn out for the sake of money and let go in priestly garments 2c.

022 Besides these, there is also an abuse in the stationaries of the Holy Ghost, St. Anthony, and others like them, which deceive the peasants and simple-minded, and confound them with innumerable superstitions and delusions. In our opinion, the same stationers should also be put down altogether. <sup>a)</sup>

(a) abthun) Go on beautifully, holy pope, the See of Rome has confirmed it, which has never erred.

(53) It is also another abuse to dispense with ordained persons, and to permit them to take wives. Now this dispensation should be given to no one except for the entertainment of a people or nation, in great and most important matters,<sup>b</sup> before these times, when the Lutherans insist on this article to the utmost.

b) Things) He nevertheless wants to keep the power to sell the marriage; that is reformirt!

54) Furthermore, it is an abuse in marriages between blood friends or brothers-in-law to dispense with them. For we hold it there-

1) Instead of: "after" in the editions probably "the after" should be read.

For that one should not give such dispensation in the other degree and member except for<sup>c</sup> the sake of public, important causes. But in other degrees and members only for the sake of some causes, and, as we have said, without money. They would then already have been given together and enclosed. For in such a case a fine<sup>d</sup> or penance would be imposed on them for absolution for the sin committed, and applied to the expenses which your holiness does for godly custom and in honor of God. For just as there is no sin in the custom of the keys, no money may be demanded, so also, where one asks for absolution from sin, a fine may be imposed, and applied in Christian godly custom.

(c) Excepting) Gentlemen, reform with confidence. But do not surrender anything that is too close to your tyranny.

d) Fine) It would not be a great wonder if God with lightning, thunder and hellish fire turned pope, cardinals and reformers to ashes, like Sodom 2c. How shamefully they mock the wretched Christians. Oh, dear God, look at them for once!

(55) It is also another abuse, that one absolves the ZirsoiUusos and spiritual usurers. For, alas, this poisonous vice now reigns and prevails in God's church to such an extent and power that even some are not at all ashamed to practice simonei<sup>e</sup> and spiritual usury. From that time on they ask for absolution from the chastisement; yes, they buy the absolution and also keep the purchased spiritual usury.

e) Simonei) Yes, what is Simonei of this time? All monasteries, popes, and cardinals would be desolate if Simonei, which existed before times, were there.

056 This we do not say, that thy holiness hath no power to remit to the cimoniusis and ecclesiastical usurers the penalties imposed upon them by human law and jurs positives, but that thy holiness shall in no wise resist such great iniquity, seeing that there is no vice more injurious nor more grievous than the ecclesiastical usury, simony, and haggling for ecclesiastical fiefs<sup>f</sup>.

f) Yes, the pope may reserve everything to do.

(57) Neither should the clergy and ecclesiastics be permitted to grant and testify to anyone of the church's goods, except for urgent<sup>g</sup> great causes, lest the goods of the poor be turned to special pleasure and great houses be built.

g) urgent) That is where and if they wanted, it is called urgent.

i) Value) Such value shall stand in the will of the pope, according to which the penny rings.

k) But that the hands of the pope are not closed, the reformation does no harm to the wicked.

(l) All things) Yea, indeed, the splinters are stirred a little, and the awful beams are confirmed; the gnats are set, and the cameos are swallowed up.

(m) Behold, is it for raiment? but where remaineth the fairs, and the dreadful fair, and many other abominable, blasphemous abominations and principal things in Rome, and in all the world? Such beams must remain.

069 And though we be too weak and lowly in these great matters and dealings, and this commerce be far above our ability, yet we have done with it our consciences, and have a wondrous hope, that under thee, Princes, we shall see the Christian church purified and beautiful, and as a peaceful dove living with the whole body in the highest unity, with everlasting remembrance of thy name, praise, and glory.

070 Thou hast taken the name of Paul: therefore we hope thou wilt follow his love, and shew love toward the church, as he did. St. Paul is mentioned as having preached the name and merit of Christ among the Gentiles.

011 Now we hope that thou wilt be chosen to restore and<sup>n</sup> restore the name of Christ, both darkened by the heathen and by us clerics, and heal the sickness in our hearts and works, and bring the sheep of Christ again into one fold, and turn away from us God's wrath and vengeance, well deserved, which we see ready and pressing upon our necks.

1) We give here some more detailed news about the members of the Committee of Cardinals: Caspar Contarini was later legate at the Diet of Regensburg in 1541. John Peter Caraffa became pope in 1555, under the name of Paul IV. James Sadoletus, bishop of Carpentras, is known for his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. Reginald Polus (kools), formerly archbishop of Canterbury, had fled from England on account of the innovations of Henry VIII. Frederick Fregoso, Archbishop of Salerno, published our writing at Rome in 1538 under the above title; later, in 1539, he became a Cardinal. Jerome Aleander, Archbishop of Brindisi and Cardinal, is the well-known Papal Nuncio at the Diet of Worms in 1521. John Matthew Gibertus was Bishop of Verona. Gregorius Cortes was abbot of St. George in Venice. Thomas Badia, Papal Lord Chamberlain, the theologian of the Dominican Order; in 1542 he too became a Cardinal.

1231: The Roman King Ferdinand's (alleged) letter to Luther. The 1st(?) Feb.1537.

This letter was first published by D. Polykarp Leyser in 1607 in his streun uff ilneodum Gretserum, x. 43, stating that he found it inserted in an old volume (eoäiees, which formerly belonged to Luthern. After this Goldast included it in the Ooustitut. ilux. toru. III, p. 561; further, Gerhard in the eonkoss. entü., lib. I, xnrt. I., enp. 4, x. 43, and Matthias Hoe in his I,utü. tünurunturA. Gerhard has already justly doubted the genuineness of this letter a and so has Seckendorf, list. I'utü., üb. III, x. 162, Vää. I. The latter gives even more locations there.

Ferdinandus, by the grace of GOD, Roman, Hungarian and Bohemian king 2c.

Honourable, learned, devout one! Although before the time when we arrived in Germany in our youth, and were first placed in princely, and then, by the gracious grant of the Almighty, in royal government, we did not like your writings and teachings that went out then and thereafter, but, according to the report of some of our preachers and confessors, considered them heretical, seductive, and repugnant and inappropriate to the holy Roman Church's statutes and commandments: Nevertheless, for the past two years, as much as our excellent duties, in which we have at times taken little time, may have suffered, we have been reading some of your books, and especially psalms, which are mostly directed to royal and princely rule.

2. In addition, it has also occurred to me that one of our confessors, of the Order of the Barefoot, whom we brought with us from Hispania, recently departed from God, who, shortly before his departure, demanded of us to come to him and confessed how he had deceived us until now and had not shown us the right path to salvation; with the highest request to graciously forgive him for God's sake, and now to immediately accept with our kingdoms, principalities and lands granted by God the saving Gospel, which is diligently and faithfully taught and propagated by you, and also to guide and bring our most beloved Lord brother, the Roman Emperor, so that such a thing may also be done by his majesty and love, if he would die all the happier and more willingly.

(3) In addition, we have been informed by our nobles, our rulers, and the kingdom's faithful, Hans Offling, Chancellor of Bohemia, and Andreas Ungnad, both barons, who listened to your sermon last autumn in Torgau, and who also had verbal conversation and sub-conversation with you, how you at that time had a Christian and a friend.

I have heard you say that you have made a good distinction between your sermons and especially your works, and that you have otherwise given them reasonable information about your doctrine, on which it is based.

4. From these and other Christian motives, before because we feel the pope and his scholars, whom you, for the sake of their order, doctrine and life, as we have in part inquired from your writings, in manifold ways seriously and arduously, against you so faintheartedly, and (as we may well report) uncomposed and unpublished, our royal mind, which was ungracious to you before, has mellowed, and (thanks be to God in eternity) has turned to such an extent that we may now well suffer and tolerate your teaching, insofar as you remain steadfast in divine and biblical Scripture, and in addition do nothing rebellious or contrary to Christ. For we have now unfortunately found that the pope and his followers have hitherto sought their own, and have divided and sold us chaff for grain.

5. Therefore we are minded to deliver in a few days, for the sake of these and other excellent things, a respectable embassy, inclined to the Gospel, in Hispania to His Imperial Majesty, our most beloved lord and brother, and to act diligently with his majesty and love, And let the things, touching our confessor's blessed report, request, and also our understanding, inquired and apprehended from thy books, diligently act with his majesty and love, and exhortation do, whether we may move his love, which doubts us not at all, to that end. And in case it is irrelevant to his majesty and love, then, notwithstanding the Pope's intended council, as Roman king, to proclaim a common imperial diet in a convenient place, and to unanimously and finally unite and compare ourselves with the estates of the Holy Roman Empire cities, your and other scribes' council, according to divine and reasonable discretion, for the sake of the faith of Christian 1) religion.

In our gracious opinion we do not want to save you from this, in order to work and execute the truth the more nobly. Given in our Tyrolean county, in our city of Innsbruck, the first Monday of February, 2) Anno 1537, ours.

1) "Christian" put by us instead of: "spiritual".

2) Also this time determination makes the letter suspicious. If one takes it like this: Monday, February 1, it is wrong, because in 1537 the first of February was a Thursday. But if we take it to mean "the first Monday in February" (Feb. 5), the time would undoubtedly have been: Monday after Mary's Purification (or kuriūeutious), Seckendorf and Walch take February 1.

Empires, the Roman in the seventh and the other in the twelfth year. Ferdinandus ^ ä Nanckatnm.

To the honorable and learned, to our and the empire's dear faithful, Martin Luther, the H. Scripture teacher at Wittenberg.

1232 D. Martin Luthers Bedenken des Concilii halben, zu Schmalkalden gestellt im Februar 1537.

This misgiving is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 379; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 1074; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 149, in De Wette, vol. V, p. 51, and in the Erlangen, vol. 55, p. 168. According to Seckendorf, Ilist. lmtü., lik. III, p. 145 it is placed before the arrival of the Papal Nuncio Borst, that is, before February 24.

001 I see, and I fear, that it shall come to pass at last, that there is no need to be afraid, though God is almighty, and is called, who hath hitherto wrought many things otherwise than we mean.

(2) There is no doubt in my mind that the pope or his own are afraid and want to see the council hindered, but that they can boast with confidence that they have not been lacking because they have announced it. They have sent messengers and summoned the estates to see how they would arrange it.

(3) Therefore they have presented to us a devil's head hideous, so that only should be frightened and flee back, namely, that they proclaim such a Concilium, in which they report nothing of church things, nothing of interrogation, nothing of other things, 2c. but only the Lxstirpation or extermination of the poisonous Lutheran heresy, as they interpret themselves in the Bulla, äo Uokormmtüono Euriae, 3).

(4) Hereby we have not only already our judgment, which is to be passed upon us in the Concilio, but the appeal with interrogation, answer, and action of all things is added, also all pious, honorable people, who might be chosen as mediators, are struck away; but the cursed knaves of the devil want to do their bidding, not only condemn them (for they want to be sure of this from the previous bull issued against us), but also immediately begin the execution and extermination, and to be-

If we are not yet interrogated (as all rights demand), even they, the Cardinals, have never read our Scriptures, nor recognized the doctrine, because our books are forbidden everywhere, but only the false writers and liars have heard, and have not heard us, although in German lands both bishops and princes know, even in their part, that [they are] lying books and boys, whom the Pope, Welsh and other nations believe.

5th For we have heard at Wittenberg from the Pope's orator, Petro Paulo Vergerio, 1) that he is not mean, and is reported much differently, neither he finds it with us, in many pieces. Also the king of France's embassy, Doctor Gervasius, publicly confessed before us that his king was thus persuaded, and certainly held that with us Lutherans there was no marriage, no authority, no church, nor anything. From where the king, pope, and other nations got this, can be well reckoned. The wicked man of Halle and his like have brought in books, perhaps also writings, in order to defend our books. But God is not caught.

(6) That the pope and his own are in some respects far too eager to believe such shameful and impudent lies, and are therefore obliged to interrogate us. Without what else their part will bring up against them than that the pope and cardinals tear apart and devastate the monasteries and convents, the bishop of Halle has three bishoprics and his like canons have many benefices, and countless things, which even without Luther's things might well be subject to a concilii. But the Bulla keeps all this quiet, fearing that it might be stirred up in the Council.

007 Wherefore they would gladly discourage us, that we should refuse, that they might be sure, and say that we had hindered it. And

1) Pierre Paolo Vergerio, Bishop of Capo d'Istria, who has appeared several times in this chapter as a papal orator and legate (No. 1218 ff.), had become acquainted with Lutheran doctrine in Germany, and after his return to Italy in 1541, since he endeavored to refute it, had been converted to the truth by reading Lutheran writings. He left his bishopric and first worked for the Gospel in Upper Italy. In 1548 he left Italy, preached the gospel in Grisons and Württemberg, and died in Tübingen in 1565.

2) De Wette: "Klöster-Stift".
we would not remain alone in displeasure, and would have to hear that by our refusal we would have strengthened all such abominations of the pope, which otherwise might have been corrected.

008 For behold, the devil in his wicked wretches, that they would not condemn, but destroy; which is this: they have hitherto diligently practised the Canonem Si Papa, etc., and in our time have shed much innocent blood, put all plagues upon many pious, honest people, chased them away, afflicted them, and dealt miserably with them, solely because they took the sacrament, 2c. knowing well that it was right.

009 Now they will judge such bloodshed and persecution in the council, and not only that, but also first of all they will begin and confirm such devilish raging, and force us to believe it to be right, and to be their masters, so that their bloodshed, persecution, blasphemy, and the destruction of Christendom, which they have committed before, and are still committing, and intend to commit forever, may be loaded on our consciences, and knowingly drag into hell with them. Let the devil do this, as he does through them.

010 All these things would be sufficient cause that they should have been attacked and torn asunder long ago. But because we have the advantage that it will become (as is the case at this time) a lousy, despised concilium, in which there will be few potentates; moreover, that the ban (where they wanted to make it) has long been dead, even now the concilium will come to such a clamor that it may err, and has often erred, so that it has lost its power and prestige, that they must even show a high apparent justice, so that it may again come to honor. For if this Bulla 3) should come to an end and be struck out, what a mocking, ridiculous Concilium it should be held by all pious, honest people, and give a delicious example to others, as Costnitz Concilium 2c., which foolishness has now also been revealed by God's Word:

011 So I would not be afraid of such hempen renders, but let them go away.

2000 Eri. 55, i7i f. Sect. 2. Convente zu Schmalkalden. No. 1232 f. W. xvi, 2429-2431. 2001 and pour out their foals and their bells completely, and do not give a negative answer to the legate (who would desire his safekeeping), but do not entrap me either; for they will (whether God wills it) pour out the great fool after the little one as well. So here, too, there is no need to hurry, and we must learn God's way, which does not hurry, but patiently draws them out until he puts a stake in front of their tongues, so that they cannot pull them back into their mouths.

012 For if we should hasten thus without necessity, and fish for God before the name, we should labour in vain. For we must have his help with us, as they that are too weak for the devil's reason.

(13) This would also cause great annoyance, and perhaps even apostasy among many good people, if we were to refuse the Council at this time, when the Turk is present and the emperor is at work. Although I believe that the Roman boys (because they knew that this would be the case with the Turks and the French) have placed the Council in this very year, so that the Lutherans would not prevent it, but that it would be prevented by the Turks and the French. Although they would prefer that it be called hindered by the Lutherans. For that would have to be called will of courage; that would have been forced by necessity, so that it could not have been held before the Turk. In sum, they cannot tolerate a council, not even of their own part, if they are not to do as they please.

1233 The first petition of the Emperor's Orator and Vice-Chancellor, as far as the appointed Concilium is concerned. February 15, 1537.

This document, together with the three that follow, are from a print that came out in 1537 in quarto in Wittenberg under the title: "Wahrhafter Unterricht etlicher Handlungen, die sich Pabst Pauli des Nahmens des III. Concilii halben, das er den nechstkünftigen 23. The title of this book is: "Veritable Instruction of Some Acts which Pabst Pauli, in the name of the III Concilii, which he has decreed for the 23rd day of the mowing against Mantua, between the Roman Kahserlicher Maj. Orator and Vice-Canzler, Doctor Matthiasen Held, and the Elector, Princes, Counts, Lords, also the cities, which are related to the true evangelical confession and confection, took place at the new Reichstag held in Schmalkalden.

have. And so that everyone may read, see, and examine that the answers given to the above-mentioned confession relatives, for all the actions on which they are based, are well-founded and true, then the same actions, as those which took place one after the other, are listed at the end of this print. According to this in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 379; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 1076 and in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 151. Also in Hortleder, vol. I, lib. I, oax. 25, p. 98. The acts themselves, "as they passed one after another," are found in Hortleder, vol. I, lid, VII, 6nx. I, 8^, P. 1231.

(1) Your High and Princely Grace undoubtedly have good knowledge that the Imperial Majesty in her own person, and in her absence through her envoys, has had the matters of religion thoroughly considered and discussed at many imperial congresses as to how they should be settled peacefully; but after much deliberation it has finally been concluded that a common general council should be held. Now her Majesty has truly spared no serious diligence, effort, or labor on her part, and has endeavored so long that she has brought such a council to be announced, and her Majesty has finally been of the mind, after her Majesty has come from Africa, to remain in the realm so long until such a council is held and the disputed religious matters are settled. And it is not the least grievance that her Majesty had to go to her Hispanic hereditary kingdoms this winter. However, so that Your Royal and Princely Grace will not think that the Concilium should be prevented due to Her Majesty's absence, Her Majesty has commanded me to announce that she intends to return to Italy this spring and to attend the Concilium in person. That also her Majesty shall not prevent anything, but only force of war, which they do not want to resist. As then her Majesty has sent herself in all other ways with her court servants and otherwise to appear again in Italy at the time in question.

(2) And even if great matters of war should occur which would prevent Her Majesty from appearing in person at the Concilio, in that case Her Imperial Majesty will take such precautions that for Her Majesty's sake there will again be no lack at the Concilio. It will also not be acceptable to His Imperial Majesty. Majesty that the war between Her Majesty and the King of France be settled, for which the Frenchman has wantonly forced Her Imperial Majesty beyond all his promises, treaties, oaths, letters, and seals.

003 And therefore the imperial majesty understands, because your royal and princely grace is all-

The Emperor has shown himself inclined to have the disputed religious matters settled peacefully, and this cannot be done better than by a General Council, to which Your Royal and Princely Grace also invoke that Your Royal and Princely Grace and those who are turned towards them will faithfully promote such Council with all diligence. And thereupon, Their Imperial Majesty requests a full report as to what Your Royal and Princely Grace and the same favouring ones think of the Concilium, to have the same visited personally or by their envoys, and to conduct themselves therein like other Christian members, especially since the Concilium alone is the right way by which such discord of religion may be settled, and other nations are also inclined to do so, that Your Royal and Princely Grace has shown itself to be as Christian, peaceful, and benevolent as hitherto, and that Her Imperial Majesty has provided for and graciously comforted it, and has faithfully promoted such a General Council on its part, and will not now be moved or persuaded to do otherwise, and will not give cause for such a General Council to be delayed, or for a schism to be practiced therein. And the Imperial Majesty hopes that the Almighty will grant his grace that the discord will not only be settled, but also that the Christian Church will be brought into a good reformation, to the praise and honor of God the Almighty, for which Her Imperial Majesty will not spare any diligence, effort, or work, but will, as before, hold and show himself as a praiseworthy Christian Emperor.

(4) Consider also your Imperial Majesty, where your sovereign and princely grace would seek delay or excuse therein, that not only thereby such good conduct might perhaps be prevented, but would also give rise to other nations' thoughts, as if one were more inclined to unrest than to peaceful unity.

(5) Your Imperial Majesty graciously gives notice of all this, so that Your Royal and Princely Grace may decide all the more wisely and not give cause for hindrance. For their Imperial Majesty seeks nothing else than that God the Almighty may be praised and honored, and that common Christianity may also benefit from it. And we graciously entreat Your Royal and Princely Grace that these things be done not only for Her Majesty's honor and subservience, but also for the benefit of the common Christians; but also for the comfort, welfare and good of common Christendom. Majesty's gracious confidence. His Majesty will in turn owe this in all graces.

6. Majesty has imposed this point on him in particular, because it is highly important, where he has If he finds himself in a blockade or exodus, that he should reject it with diligence for the best, that he recognizes himself guilty to do and inherits, to show the cause to the best of his ability in all submissive manner. Where some explanation is needed in his application, he will also let himself be heard and offered to do so according to the Emperor's Majesty's command.

This advertisement was made by Doctor Matthias Held, Imperial Majesty's Councillor, Vice-Chancellor and Embassy to the Elector of Saxony, and Landgrave Philippe of Hesse, and their Electoral and Princely Graces in matters of religion and faith, who are in the Nuremberg stalemate, at Schmalkalden, Thursday after Esto mihi [Feb. 15], Anno 1537.

1234 The answer of the Christian confessionals to the imperial orator and bicchancellor's request, as far as the Concilium is concerned. February 24, 1537.

See the previous number.

(1) But when the Roman Imperial Majesty finally graciously gave us notice of an announced and scheduled council, with most gracious request. Maj. has graciously given us notice of an indicated and scheduled concilium, with most gracious request, because such a concilium would be the way by which the occurred discord in religion could be settled, that we would visit or attend the same and let ourselves be heard, what our will and mind would be in it.

(2) Thereupon we may not leave it undeclared to Her Imperial Majesty. 2. Then we may not leave it undeclared to Her Imperial Majesty in submission that it has not long since reached us before this time how the present Pope Paul, of the name of the Third, is supposed to have scheduled and indicated in the past Pentecost at Rome a General Council against Mantua, to be held in the near future on May 23, by a Bulla 1). Which bull and its contents, because we have received copies of it, we have been moved to the necessity of gathering here primarily for this reason; however, we find that the aforementioned Pabst's statements do not compare at all with the most gracious and Christian opinions of the Emperor's Majesty, as the same has also been felt and found with some of his ancestors in this most important matter.

003 For the imperial majesty hath in most gracious remembrance, though pope Adrianus, of the name the Sixth, had his legate at the Imperial Diet at Nuremberg in the second and twentieth year of the few number, and there made the following statement 1) before their Imperial Majesty the Governor, also the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire. They had the following statement 1) made and presented before their imperial governors, princes, princes and estates of the empire, namely, that for some years there had been many abominable things in the see of Rome, abuses in the ecclesiastical, overreaching in commandments 2) and statutes, and finally all things had been changed into the perverse, therefore no wonder that the addiction had struck and come from the head into the limbs, from popes into the sub-prelates. That also pope, prelates, and clergy had deviated, each in his own way, and now for a long time there had been no one who did good, not one, with a distant appendix, that the said pope's legate should promise the German princes that he would turn all diligence to this end, so that first the Roman court, from which such evil all comes, might be reformed 2c.

(4) However, such a request was almost changed soon after the death of the said Pope Adriani, when Clement the Seventh became Pope, as is shown by his legate's 3) advertisement and action, which he had at Imperial Majesty's other and next following Imperial Diet at Nuremberg. Majesty's other and next following Imperial Diet at Nuremberg. And has Her Imperial Majesty by Her Majesty Majesty, through her Majesty's Governor and Orator, as well as the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, for excellent reasons, causes and motives, had a resolution made and established there to hold a general universal and free council in the German nation. 4)

005 That such a council may be meant, and no other, than that which, according to a right, free, Christian council, might be useful for the reformation of all errors and abuses rooted in the church, both in heads and members, and not according to the manner and form which for a time have been made and kept by the popes.

(6) Her Imperial Majesty has issued such a Nuremberg Imperial Decree of a free, universal and Christian Council to us, the protesting Estates, at the negotiation of our lords, cousins and most gracious lords of the two Electors of Main and Palatinate. Majesty has, upon the negotiation of our lords Ohm, cousins and most gracious lords, both Electors, Mainz and Palatinate, against us, the protesting estates, in her Majesty's established and prescribed assurance of peace and peace of mind.

The first of the two and thirtieth years of the lesser number, graciously confirmed and confirmed. 5)

(7) However, contrary to all the opinions determined and approved by Her Majesty Most Gracious, and also by the Empire of the German Nation, the aforementioned Pope Clement, in the third and thirtieth year of the few number, had us, the protesting Estates, hold a concilium through his Nuncium envoy, with Imperial Majesty their Orator. Majesty her Oratorem with him, the contents of some articles presented, 6) and have them proposed. Thereupon we have submitted to Her Imperial Majesty's Oratori, with all the answers, 7) which they have received. Majesty's Oratori, with sufficient explanation as to why we do not wish to regard such a Concilium as a common, free, Christian Concilium, and the Imperial Majesty's Governors and Orators, as well as the Princes, Princes and Estates concerned, as conforming to the agreements, obligations and acts made. To this he has also proposed the Malstatt in Italy, which is why we do not know how to consent to the same. But for the sake of a righteous, free council, we have made Christian, honorable, and reasonable requests, as all of Nunci's advertising and actions, as well as our given answer, sufficiently demonstrate, to which we wish to refer.

(8) We have also given the same answer when the present Pope Paul, in the fifth and thirtieth year, next to some of ours, had a council held in Italy, indicated by his nuncio, and not to be led out of the kingdom, as the copy enclosed here clearly and sufficiently shows.

(9) But concerning this we find from the said Pope Paul's alleged bulls, so that he proclaims the Concilium at Rome, that he has not only written to hold a Concilium concealed from the most gracious intention of the Emperor's Majesty, and from the decrees established and confirmed in the realm of his Majesty, but also contrary and improper to our given answers, but at the same time a dangerous and deceitful 9) Concilium, as Pope Clement has publicly given to understand by his articles.

010 For from the same bull it is recorded that he is not only disinclined to have errors, unchristian grievances, and abuses spoken and acted of in a christian manner, even with earnestness and truth, but irrefutably admits understand that our Christian confession and our teacher's doctrine, founded in God's words, should rather be condemned and condemned with his bull than his supposed concilium is begun.

(11) Which is clear from the fact that, among other things, he mentions this cause in such an indication, 1) namely, "the new heresies and errors that have arisen," 2c. Item, that he does not report anything further or different about any just Christian act of faith, but only that 2) the eradication of all heresies is to be dealt with in such his intended Concilio.

12. Now it is easy to think that he does not mean his and the churches' doctrine and customs at Rome, but he wants to condemn our Christian confession (as his leader, Pope Leo the Tenth, did by his bulls, and the following popes by the bull Oosnns Oornini), with the bull of his supposed Concilii 3) have condemned and ungodly condemned the eternal truth of God and of his only Son, the Gospel of our Lord JEsu Christ, and persist in his ancestral footsteps, and let nothing concerning doctrine, error, and abuses be dealt with in the Concilio, for how such doctrine is to be eradicated as a heresy.

13) And that this is his opinion is further confirmed and clearly shown by his bulla, which he had published almost three months later, when the supposed indiction of the Concilii took place at Rome, for the pretence of reforming his Roman court, in which he declares publicly and with expressed words, 4) that he was moved to institute the Concilium, as a cause, for the extermination of half the poisonous Lutherans (so that he may mean nothing but our Christian confession), as well as other heresies.

(14) Above this he clearly shows his condemnation of our confession, and proves it in fact by the fact that he kills, murders, slaughters, and chases away the confessors and followers of our [doctrine] and of the same our confession, before such a supposed council has ever been written out, or before some Christian, acceptable act has been done or performed in it with divine Scripture, and also lets others kill, murder, chase away, and slaughter them, and procures, approves, and sanctions such things.

4) No. 1225, § 2 in this volume.

5) Added by us.

(15) May His Imperial Majesty, as a most praiseworthy, virtuous Emperor, and the whole world, consider it dangerous for him, as if it were his opinion and mind, to reform his and his bishops' [and] clergy's unchristian abominations, errors, and abuses (of which many excellent, God-fearing, and learned people have long complained, and have cried and screamed about) in a Christian manner and to have them acted upon.

(16) Cunningly moves the Catholic Majesty. Majesty, who considers his mind and earnestness to be there, as reported, that her Majesty graciously admonishes us and other estates to such concilio, since undoubtedly her Majesty would not have allowed herself to be moved to promote Pabst's Pauli Concilium, if her Majesty had knowledge of such danger and deceit.

17. For this purpose he sends his messengers to other Christian kings and potentates, and also to us, this part of the states, on pretended appearance, and yet with concealed deceit, to induce reported kings and potentates and us by trickery to such a concilio, and to make them and us subject to the same, and also thereupon to execute and enforce his unjust and ungodly actions, and to hold our confession condemned and condemned beside and with him before the Concilio, and to help to ratify his void Damnation. However, the high imperial, royal, princely, and noble minds, as those inclined to virtuous and upright actions, will undoubtedly not participate in any fraud, nor will they allow themselves to be induced to do so.

(18) But, which is still more dangerous, he supposes by such requests of his nuncii to obtain and bring about unnoticed that we, as the Emperor Julianus Apostata did against the Christian men of war, should condemn our Christian confession by grant of the Concilii itself, and like him, and help to conclude its extinction against us and our doctrine, without any act of truth. This, however, is such a wicked deception and abuse that it cannot be excused by Pope Paul, either according to divine commandments or the respectability of the world.

019 For this purpose, although the above-mentioned pope and his ecclesiastical followers (because our confession, and also the doctrine of ours, is most opposed to the abominable errors and abuses of papal and episcopal authority and statutes) are the most prominent opponents, yet he will (in spite of natural equity, and the fact that it is not due to him as a part) maintain the same confession and doctrine.

and to condemn them. In this, his clergy have never been repugnant to him, and this dispute affects them just as much as the pope, moreover, that they are bound to him with hard oaths, also to preserve his statutes or his position, and otherwise.

(20) Such their acts, intentions, and undertakings will undoubtedly be regarded by the imperial majesty, as well as by other Christian kings, potentates, and estates, not as Christian or just, but as contrary to God's and natural rights, that the pope and his clergy should have jus äsllriitziuli or eoneluäsriäi in such matters in which they find the highest, most, and noblest opponents, and should also be judges and arbiters themselves.

21. For that the pope publicly introduces, upholds, and defends false doctrine, abuses, and idolatries (which are not only contrary to the clear words of God, but also to the proven holy councils, and to the old Christian teachers, that the popes have also made traditions and statutes contrary to God's commandment, by which, certainly and without all doubt, true and truthful knowledge is obscured and suppressed), our teachers have, by the grace of God, proved superfluous up to this point. For this reason, together with them and others, we intend to accuse the pope and his attached clergy of this in a right, free, Christian, common assembly and concilium by means of divine help, and to refer it to the public in case of need. That they also simoniues without proper profession, by evil practices, also by violent and dangerous means, subjugate themselves to their estates against God and their own statutes, lead an unchristian, dishonorable and annoying life, being and way of life, of the ecclesiastical, most noble offices with seriousness. The fact that the people of the Church do not wait on the most noble offices with the seriousness due to God, do not care for the poor and needy in a proper and fair manner, and practice other innumerable abuses, annoyances, and scandals, is not known to all of Christendom, and there is no need to make a wide-ranging report of it. Therefore the pope, by virtue of his own rights, cannot declare a lawful Christian council, much less consider himself head and president of such a council.

22 Because it is in the form of the pope himself, much less may his ecclesiastical associates, who are related to him in all the errors and abominations mentioned above, and who are bound by duties as mentioned above, be in such a council as co-judges, judges, and discerners, nor may they be in the same council as the pope himself.

The Roman Emperor and all Christian kings, princes, and potentates know and have undoubtedly sufficient evidence of this. All Christian kings, princes, and potentates know this, and have undoubtedly sufficient report of it.

(23) Finally, we have also noted that he wants the Council in Italy to be held against Mantua, since Imperial Majesty and her orators and commanders in its place have decided that it would be convenient to hold it in the German nation. Majesty and, in his stead, his orators and commanders, as well as princes, princes, and estates, have considered and decided that it would be fair and convenient to hold it in the German nation. And the pope thinks to change and overturn the decision of the empire, not without contempt of the imperial majesty and the empire of the German nation. Moreover, we are not yet certain that all other kings and potentates will consent or agree to hold a concilium in Mantua, and in Italy they have their most noble parties and followers, so that it would be dangerous and dangerous, and even unsafe, for us to come to the concilium in person and through messages sent by us.

024 For though we, the protesting estates, would have a sufficient and constant assurance, yet the pope's followers and party in Italy are particularly unbalanced, unpleasant, and repugnant to us and our teachers, on account of our Christian confession, so that we and our embassies cannot be well assured of the end of secret troubles, nor of practices, which the places have to attend to more than elsewhere.

25. In addition, because this is the most important trade under the sun at this time, concerning salvation and eternal damnation, it is necessary for us to have a large and good number, together with a considerable number of our teachers, preachers, and pastors (who confessed with us before the Emperor's Majesty at the Imperial Diet held in Augsburg, and who, like each of our estates, are also involved in and encountered by them), to be of our own person, and not to place such matters on embassies or procurators alone, so it would be quite burdensome and worrisome for us to dispose of ourselves outside of the Empire of the German Nation in Italy, together with the reported preachers and teachers who have confessed to us, and to leave our lands and people under our opponents in the Empire for these matters, as well as the people and subjects without preachers and teachers for a long time.

26 For these necessary concerns and causes, as well as others of the same kind, let His Imperial Roman Majesty graciously consider and consider what reasonable, brave, and powerful difficulties we have in entering into this matter. Majesty graciously consider and consider what reasonable, brave, and mighty difficulties we have to face in order

Pope Pauli dangerously announced Concilium, and that the same outside the Empire of the German Nation in Italy should request and provide. We also ask your Imperial Majesty. Most humbly, that, as a noble, virtuous Emperor, we will not, in disgrace, be held responsible for the causes and difficulties indicated, and that, as the temporal supreme head, set and decreed by God primarily for the protection and protection of true and Christian worship, we will graciously promote these most important matters and actions, so that the eternal, imperishable truth of God may advance, and Christian constant unity may be planted, established, and carried out in the German nation on the right foundation, which is Christ, our Lord and Savior, and His holy Gospel, to His praise and glory, in a common, free, Christian concilio, without all dangerous, partial, suspicious, and unjust actions.

27 For we may testify from our hearts that we want to stand, live, and die with God's help in the faith which the true Christian church believes and holds, and that we do not think to differ from the unity of the true Christian church, and that in this matter we seek nothing but the honor and glory of God the Almighty and of His dear Son JESUS CHRIST, and besides this, the blessedness of all men, that they may be instructed by God's word and brought to the right worship of God.

28 We wish to report this to the Imperial Majesty's Oratori and Vice-Chancellor for an urgent report and answer; we also graciously request and kindly ask him to promote this most humble answer of ours to the Imperial Majesty in the most humble and best way. We also offer ourselves to Imperial Majesty for all obedience that is owed and possible according to God, and want to earn it for Her Imperial Majesty, as our most gracious Lord and Emperor, in all subservience always willingly, subserviently and gladly, and also graciously and favorably instruct and kindly earn it for the Imperial Orator. Date Schmalkalden, on Saturday on the day of St. Matthew [24 Feb], Anno Domini 1537.

Johannes Friederich, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c.

Philip, Landgrave of Hesse. For ourselves and others our kinsmen.

1235: The Imperial Orator and Vice-Chancellor's Rejoinder and Further Indication of the Answer Given to the Christian Confession, 1537.

See No. 1233.

(1) As far as the answer of the indicated Council is concerned, Her Royal and Princely Graces and those who are attached to them, Their Imperial Majesties and those who are attached to them have clearly heard the Christian mind and intention of faithfully promoting and personally attending the same Council as before, and have undoubtedly felt it many times before. Majesty's Christian mind and intention to faithfully promote and personally attend the same Concilium as hitherto, have clearly and loudly heard, and no doubt felt and found before too many times that their Imperial Majesty's mind cannot be otherwise. Majesty's mind is no other than to promote and attend the Concilium, so that in the same Concilio the discord in religion may be peacefully and Christianly settled, and Christianity brought into a good reformation and being, especially to the glory and praise of Almighty God, and to the blessedness of all pious Christians. To this end, Her Imperial Majesty, as a Christian Her Majesty, as a Christian head and authority, will not allow anything to be done to her in the future, and her Majesty would have liked to see a General Council long ago, as the same Council has been considered at all Imperial Conventions and elsewhere for the right, peaceful and united Christian way, and her Imperial Majesty does not yet know how to devise a more suitable or better means. Therefore Her Imperial Majesty Majesty has taken upon himself to promote such a council, at the request of the common estates of the Empire, and, as her Imperial Majesty has promised to God, he has taken it upon himself to do so. Majesty had hoped to God, as far as the tender is concerned, has now faithfully fulfilled her promise. Since such a General Council is therefore consoling and still in existence, and should be beneficial, Her Imperial Majesty would certainly not have had to make a decision. Majesty would certainly not have provided for any complaint in this case with her electoral and princely graces and their relatives. Her Imperial Majesty, if the answer given should remain the same, would not bear a little painful pity for this, considering what misfortune might follow from it. Since this article is important and great, and much good may result from it for common Christianity, especially as far as the salvation of souls is concerned, Their Imperial Majesties have not displeased me. Majesty has not unreasonably enjoined me to take up such an article with her electoral and princely graces and those who are turned towards her, and to receive a definite, clear, compliant answer to it, which I then partly agree with.

...with all humble and faithful diligence, as much as is in me, will willingly perform.

(2) And therefore I humbly, diligently, and kindly ask and request of your Supreme and Federal Governments and their allies that they compare themselves differently in this article, and especially with the Imperial Majesty's mind and opinion, and that they do not want her Majesty and other Christian potentates and members to do so. And in order that their sovereign and imperial Majesty's mind and Christian opinion may be compared to that of the Emperor. Majesty's mind and Christian opinion, I herewith further declare to your Majesty and the same that Imperial Majesty's mind and Christian opinion has never been the same. Majesty's mind has never been, and still is not, to defend or handle anything in the Concilio that would be unchristian and contrary to the word of God, and much less to protect and denigrate the abuses, vexatious life and scandala, they are found equal in heads and limbs, but want their Imperial Majesty to be completely satisfied in all this. Majesty to be wholly impartial in all this, and to promote the same faithfully in other Christian heads and members. And since it is divine and right that in the General Council no partisan and sacrilegious action should take place, but only equity, and especially the Word of God and proven Scripture, and all partisanship and practices be cut off, as then their Imperial Majesty fully respects that the opinion of the other Christian heads and members is also like this, their Imperial Majesty cannot think of what their churl and F. G. and those who are related to them have to say about this. G. and their relatives may indicate for a sufficient complaint, not to attend or have attended the same council. For if partiality, advantage, and such unjust practices should not and cannot take place in the General Council, it follows irrefutably that such a General Council must be regarded as nothing other than Christian, free, and unsuspicious, and that for this reason their chur- and F. G. and their relatives should not be allowed to attend the same Council. G. and those associated with them do not sufficiently excuse themselves from the indicated council by their given answer; such an excuse might also be considered somewhat suspicious not only by the Imperial Majesty, but also by other many nations.

(3) And, as their sovereign and imperial majesty, and their relatives, papal sanctity, interpret something so sharply that, if it were so, it would not be praised by any Christian, honor-loving person, nor would it bring benefit and promotion to the disputed religious matters for a Christian settlement. But the Emperor's Majesty has decreed such a thing.

They have no knowledge of this in their minds, nor can they assume it from the papal holiness, nor can they be sure of it, but rather of the contradiction that the pope, as the most distinguished ecclesiastical head before others, would keep himself Christian and unprovable, as befits his rank and office. If, however, their ecclesiastical and federal authorities and their relatives ever want to find fault with the pope and other clergy, and consider them biased and suspicious, they may, as is proper, bring this before the Council, and act on it with Christian discipline, without envy and enmity.

(4) Likewise, whether they have a defect or deficiency in form (how and in what manner things and actions are to be performed, acted upon, and decided at the concilium in question) or in other matters, they may with good reason bring up and discuss all this before the concilium in question. For that their Supreme and Supreme Highnesses and those associated with them should, for themselves, outside the Council, presume to set a form and measure for all the other nations of Christendom as to how and what should be acted upon and decided at the Council, would not be fair, and would also have to be regarded as more partial than Christian. Her Imperial Majesty would also have no authority or power to do so for herself and with all the estates of the Holy Roman Empire, but rather the matters concerning the General Council would have to be dealt with not by a few heads, but by the general assembly of the Council, to which many more Christian, God-fearing, learned, and pious men should appear, who are well versed in and grounded in the holy divine Scriptures, and who are of an honorable way of life and conduct. And let their C. and F. Gn. and those who are attached to them by no means think that the experience of the holy Scriptures and the Holy Spirit are only in their scholars, but also in many more learned, God-fearing, righteous people in Christendom.

(5) For as far as the venue of the Council of Mantua is concerned, it is not without reason that the imperial estates, and especially their sovereigns and federations and their relatives, would have liked to have the General Council in German lands, which their imperial majesty has not prevented. However, their sovereignty and federation and their relatives must consider that the other Christian nations should have been considered. And therefore perhaps the papal holiness has chosen such a place as is most convenient, which is nearest to the German nation, with sufficient lodgings, and to which the German people can be attached.

Provisions on water and land well provided and skilful. Moreover, it lies in the holy realm and in quite good air, and is the property of the same realm without means, since even the pope and the clergy will neither seek nor find any advantage, since the city of Mantua has its own duke, the feudal lord of the holy realm. And in sum, according to the occasion, the place may not be considered inconvenient. And if their sovereign and imperial sovereigns and their relatives should have any doubts, the imperial majesty, as a peaceful, gracious emperor, who would like to see such a work of the general concilii promoted, will duly see to it and give assurance, and will procure and maintain the same with others, that their sovereign and imperial sovereigns shall come to the concilio in question, and from there again to their custody, peacefully, safely, and unoffended. For this reason, their Electoral and Princely Graces and their relatives, insofar as they deem it necessary, may make and request reasonable proposals, whereupon they will also decide that nothing reasonable should be done to the Imperial Majesty, and that their Imperial Majesty should grant their Electoral and Princely Graces the right of accession to the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty does not intend to mislead her Highness and F. G. and their relatives in any way.

(6) After all this, their electoral and princely graces and their relatives will finally discuss this further report and decide on an explicit, clear, compliant answer to their imperial majesty's request, as equity and great necessity require, and show themselves in this way, as their imperial majesty graciously consoled their electoral and princely graces and their relatives. Therefore, their electoral and princely graces and their relatives will receive the eternal reward from the Almighty God, and special grace from their Majesty.

1236 The Augsburg Confession relatives' refutation of the imperial orator and vice-chancellor's other claims. Date Schmalkalden, February 28, 1537.

See No. 1233.

(1) As for the last Concilium indicated by Pope Paul, we have heard from the Emperor's Majesty's orator that the Emperor's Majesty's mind is to promote and attend the same. Majesty's mind to promote and attend the same is no other than that in it the discord in religion may be peacefully resolved.

The church is to be brought into good reformation and character, and first of all to the praise of the Almighty and to the blessedness of all pious Christians. It is also not in the opinion of Her Imperial Majesty to defend or to do anything in the Concilio that would be unchristian and contrary to the word of God, and much less to protect and glorify the abuses, annoying life and scandal. Also, that Her Majesty considers it divine and proper that in the General Council no partisan and sacrilegious action, but only equity, and especially the Word of God and proven Scripture take place, and all partisanship and practices be cut off. 2c.

(2) That now Imperial Maj. We are pleased to hear that Your Majesty's mind on the above-mentioned Concilii stands as touched, especially that Her Majesty herself considers it divine and right that in a Concilio no partisan and beneficial actions, but only fairness, and especially the Word of God and the Holy Scriptures, should take place. Just as such matters concern the Most High and His eternal, everlasting Word, and the glory and honor of the same.

(3) But that her Imperial Maj. Maj. Pabst Pauli's mind does not have knowledge, as we have truly and thoroughly indicated in our next answer after the length, that we (in moderation, as her Maj. Orator has indicated) hold well for it, also carry no doubt, where her Maj. would have noted such and would have had knowledge, her Maj. would not at all have ordered the same Orator to promote Pabst Pauli's Concilium with us or other estates.

(4) We also humbly leave in its value what Imperial Maj. to the pope provides cheap and good about this.

(5) But because his dangerous plan is publicly inappropriate to Imperial Majesty's gracious and Christian opinion. Maj.'s most gracious and Christian opinion is publicly improper and unequal, and with his Bulla of the Indicted Concilii it is clearly evident that his opinion and will is quite repugnant, and directed to danger, also to partisan and beneficial actions, that [it] Imperial Maj. Maj. Orator himself does not know how to approve it; nor does he intend anything else with his indiction of the Concilii than to introduce us and other estates of the German nation, which are not of our confession and of this time in place, to his advantage and opinion (where we should consent to such Concilium), then we respect that Imperial Majesty will not blame us for this. Majesty will not blame us for not having placed our minds on any uncertain delusion in this matter.

but to fathom our unavoidable need of it, which by Pabst's Pauli Bull, and other certain true circumstances, is clear and before our eyes.

6th To wit, that he has already condemned, and intends to condemn, our Confession and that of ours, and other Christian doctrines, by means of the bulls reported above and others, before the beginning of the Council, by word and deed; nor can we think that he would contradict such things if he were himself personally present. And even if he would submit to it, or anyone, the contradiction is so bright and public in the day that he must be found untrue before the world with adverse reports.

(7) Thus it is also known how for some time past (although many acts in matters of faith and religion have been done and performed with kindness in conciliis, but he and his clergy have not been subjected to their will, even though they have had God's Word and all Scripture against them) he has finally reserved to him and his clergy the right to judge and jus definiendi in such matters of religion and faith as spiritual matters. Therefore we cannot think nor may we think, whether we have the whole Holy Scripture and the Holy Gospel of our Lord Christ for us, if we did not want to give way to the pope and his clergy on such and such sophistry, as was compiled at Augsburg against our Christian confession founded in the Word of God, and yet was not allowed to be given to the light by the masters in writing: If the said pope and fine clergy, as the most distinguished opponent (whom we intend to accuse with the said clergy in a righteous, common, free, Christian concilio for false doctrine, heresy, anti-Christianity, idolatry, un-Christian abominations, abuses and other things, and to overcome them with the truth by means of divine help), would at last, together with the same clergy, want to be recognized in the matters, judges and arbiters.

008 For that such is his opinion, his presumed bull of circumstantial evidence carries with it in itself, even though according to fine laws it may not be understood otherwise, nor any other understanding be taken from it.

009 Now if we should consent to attend or attend such a council, upon the understanding which its bull gives and clearly brings, we might well consider and accept, if we had once consented to it according to the reported bull's understanding, that after that we would have little service or fruitfulness of form, measure, and

For the time being, we do not know how these great matters should be handled impartially, without suspicion, Christianly, and evenly, with the pope and his clergy, and with their followers, as well as with those who are themselves opponents. Especially because we have already granted them (if we should save our need for it) all their unjust advantage and will with the approval of the Concilii.

(10) Whether such a council (in which the pope and fine clergy have already condemned our and ours' Christian confession and doctrine before the matters have ever been spoken of or acted upon, and since the pope and his clergy, as the highest opponents, finally want to be judge and arbiter) can or may be created for such a common, free, Christian council, on which Imperial Majesty, through her Majesty's governors and orators, also princes, princes and estates of the Empire of the German Nation, has decided beforehand, and her Majesty, in the Peace of Nuremberg, has given us the right of appeal. Her Majesty, through Her Majesty's Governors and Orators, as well as the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire of the German Nation, have hitherto resolved, and Her Majesty has graciously promised us in the Nuremberg Peace and Standstill Assurance, Her Majesty, as well as the Orator and all men, shall graciously and sufficiently hear from this, as well as what shall thereupon be given in case of necessity in the course of time.

11. For although we note that the Emperor's Majesty's Orator may not approve nor praise such a threat of the Pope, we nevertheless believe that he knows and understands why in the reported and other decrees and acts of the Empire, also in our Appeal and Protestation, and especially in the answers which we have given to the papal nuncios, the words "general, free, Christian concilium" are used, and that with them and the like of the popes and ecclesiastics dangerous and unreasonable opinions and actions should be cut off and occur. As is undoubtedly proper according to all rights, such words and the like are to be interpreted in such a way that they are not set in vain, and stand on paper in vain, but are to have a further effect and indicate something.

(12) For what else would it have been to use the word "free" so often in imperial acts and decrees, if only it had been understood that every state should be permitted and at liberty to advance its own opinion and needs in the Council? For liberty was formerly granted to the estates of Christendom, and also at times to private individuals; nor would it be otherwise, first of all for those who are called upon to come to the Council. But in order that the word and must undoubtedly be meant that the pope and his clergy, who are bound to each other by oaths in their matters, should not, nor must they, as they have previously subjected themselves to in some concilii, themselves be judges and arbiters in such their matters, but that other, impartial means and ways should and must be used therein. Likewise, the word "Christian" must also have a broader meaning, for it alone should be meant that Turks, unbaptized persons, and unbelievers should not be in such a council. For such a thing, without further addition of the word "Christian," would have brought the word Concilium in itself, since it is to mean an assembly of Christians; but must bathe the mind, and bring irrefutably that it is to be such a Concilium, in which procedures are to be carried out without entanglement, without suspicion, and in a Christian manner, and that only the Word of God is to be acted upon, and the doctrines are to be tried. Otherwise, the words mentioned would be completely in vain and in vain in the decisions and actions taken, without any effect, which may not be, nor should it be.

"free"	may	have	its	effect,	it	is

(13) Thus we also know well of the graces of God, and faith tells us that the true, right Christians who have God's Spirit are not scattered in one place, nor in one country alone, but in the whole world. This also pleases us not a little, that we hope to God, and bear no doubt, if only the pope and his spiritual followers have their beneficial ways and opinions broken, so that they do not have the game in their hands and power, the almighty God will grant the grace that not only our scholars, but many more pious, God-fearing, scholarly people from all nations (who undoubtedly want nothing better than to see the papal and spiritual abominations, according to the judgment of God's word, changed into a Christian change and Christianity united) come together, but who have now been conscripted, and some of whom are not yet allowed to confess the divine truth for the time being out of human fear.

(14) Why even Pope Benedict's proclamation and indicative council do not compare with the Emperor's Majesty, the Electors, and the Estates of the former imperial and approving opinions, has been sufficiently explained to Her Majesty. Orator from our next answer with excellent causes and circumstances. Nor can we again judge that a common, free, Christian council would be cheaper and more convenient in some nations.

and be held, by virtue of the above-mentioned imperial and imperial agreements, in the German nation. For although other nations are also concerned with such a council, no nation is more important than the German nation, and especially us, and many others in the German nation who belong to our confession, whose unavoidable need requires them to be present in person, together with our and their preachers and teachers in large numbers, when other kings and potentates, princes and states can decay their place through their embassies, oratores and procuratores; As also the common use hath been for some time past in Concilii.

015 And how it is with the city of Mantua, for its convenience, we leave to its value; but it is ever true that now and then there is war in Italia. And although the same cause does not hinder us so much, the same city of Mantua is suspicious to us for the indicated reasons, and, which misleads us more, the Duke of Mantua is not particularly known. In addition, we are credibly informed that his biological brother is one of the most distinguished cardinals. For this reason, it is not our place to trust in this; we also hope to God that if other nations hear these complaints and concerns of ours because of the place we occupy and the Christian actions we desire, they will not blame us for this, but will be much more cautious because of our part in another Christian nation that we grant this.

16 Thus also the Imperial Majesty knows that there are many cities in the German nation that are no less comfortable than Mantua. Maj. knows that there are many cities in the German nation that are no less comfortable than Mantua, that have their own authorities high and low, and where security, honor, loyalty, and faith are found. And praise God! so far the secret practices of killing people have been heard little in our German nation, which one hears and hears at times in others.

(17) Her Imperial Majesty shall also not take such a request from us. Majesty should not take such a request from us that we stand so hard on the imperial decrees and not let ourselves be led out of them, since such a thing was previously considered fair and right at imperial congresses. Moreover, this is not new at this time, but we find that in the same case Liberius, the bishop of Rome, as a Christian supporter and patron of Athanasius, requested the same from the emperor Constantine, that Athanasius be given a concilium in Alexandria, where the defendant and the plaintiff and the promisee were. And although such a place is far removed from the Occidentals.

and Constantine said that the whole world condemned Athanasius, and decided that whoever had fellowship with him should be deprived of Christian fellowship, but Liberius alone was the one who supported breaking up the peace of the whole world, (For what had long been in one being should not be abandoned, and the very arguments now used against us were needed, even by the emperor, his bishops, and chamberlains against Liberius), Liberius nevertheless stood on his opinion, and considered it just; And because the emperor Constantine rejected this, the world was kept in such error for a long time. But afterward it was finally found that Athanasius' opinion was just in the sight of God, and so will remain the truth of God forever. How many have nevertheless had to die and suffer innocently because of it! Thus, our well-known doctrine shall and will (whether God wills it) also be invented, whether we are allowed a comfortable place or not. For the same reason, the entire OormUiuin Ua8i1i6N86 refused to hold the Concilium in the city of Ferrara.

(18) In this case there are many more reasons why the place of Mantua is suspicious to us; for Pope Clement the Fifth had a grievance against the Emperor Henry on account of the place of Pisa, and yet considered it unreasonable that Robertus, king of Sicily, should have been cited thither.

(19) Since we do not wish to consent to or attend the much-reported council of Pope Paul at his request, and to the extent that he has done so, and his opinion and intentions are as they are, and since we have not expressly consented to it for the sake of our consciences, we hope that Her Imperial Majesty will blame the Pope and not us. Maj. will assign the blame and cause to the pope, and not to us. Since nothing else has ever been understood or heard by us, as often as we have been drawn to a council, except that we expressly and clearly want a common, free, Christian council, by virtue of Imperial Majesty, Electors of the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty, Electors, Princes, and Estates [in] the Empire. For we have always considered that if the popes were to prescribe a council of their own liking, they would not refrain from instituting it for their own benefit, so that God's word would subsequently, just as before, have to remain condemned and give way to the pope and his errors, abominations, and abuses.

(20) It may also be that the Pope Imperial Maj. Maj. nor us, that we do not have such a written Concilium. We do not wish to impose anything, since we have not only informed his ancestor, Pope Clement Nuncio, Petro Paulo Vergerio, but also his envoys of our opinion in writing beforehand in this form: Although we desire a concilium as highly as anyone else, for the sake of the unity of the Church, we would not consent to anything else, except that a common, free, Christian concilium be held in the German nation, in which, according to God's Word, the divisions that have occurred are to be dealt with, compared, and the errors eradicated. However, this is not to be found in the aforementioned Pabst's bulls and the supposed indication of his council, that he is willing to put down his and his clergy's introduced errors, abominations, and abuses by God's word and to have them recognized, as yet, Imperial Majesty the Holy Roman Emperor has done. Majest. Orator state that Imperial Maj. Maj.'s opinion and mind are to that effect.

(21) For even if the pope's will and intention were such, he should not have condemned our and ours' true Christian confession and the very Word of God, which is to judge, judge, and put down his errors, abominations, and abuses in the concilium, as Christ, the mouth of truth, Himself says that "the Word will judge" 2c. The pope wants to take from us our arms and weapons, even the true judge, God's Word, with such an unchristian damnation, before we ever come to his Council and the matters are heard there. What good and Christian, righteous and impartial action would we have to provide for ourselves in his council with him and his clergy and other of his followers, if we had submitted to his will and judgment through the approval of his council?

22 For this reason, although we have little care or doubt on the part of His Imperial Majesty, we do not believe that Her Majesty's mind is entirely sincere. Majesty take little precaution or doubt, for that her Majesty's mind, as touched upon above, is quite sincere, right, and Christian in this, therefore it grieves us all the more that we have to give her Imperial Majesty the same reason. Majesty's Majesty's will, let us nevertheless with Imperial. Majesty. Majesty's good opinion against such dangers of the pope. For as much as His Majesty would be at the Concilio in person, no one is ignorant of the power and authority that they allow their Majesty and other Christian kings, princes, potentates, and secular states in religious and spiritual matters, as they give them names, to have in their Conciliis. For if the pope and his ecclesiastics do so much as to give them the power and authority in their conciliates

They allow them to consult voces consultativas, but they reserve decisivas for them alone, whether Imperial Majesty and the secular estates want to go too far with their counsels against them. Majesty and the secular estates want to go too far against them with their counsels, that they nevertheless have the reins in their hands, and may finally conclude and decide as they please. Therefore, Imperial Majesty will not blame us. Majesty will not blame us for not consenting to such a public danger to Pabst Pauli. For nature shows in unreasonable creatures that they avoid the traps that have been laid and recognized. It is more convenient for us, as Christians, who have been commanded by God to be cautious in the matters of His divine Word, to shun and avoid the obvious danger of Pabst Paul.

23 Thus it is also evident how the Council of Constance acted with Emperor Siegmund, this time in the Roman dignities: which pious emperor (as is said) is said to have given escort and security to John Hussein; but the Council weakened his imperial majesty in this, and declared to him to great displeasure that in cases of emperors, kings, and others, he was not obliged to keep escort. Majesty, and declared to his great displeasure that the ecclesiastics were not obliged to keep escort in the cases of emperors, kings, and others. And that therefore the pious king has had to tolerate his escort being broken, which has undoubtedly been a hearty burden to him.

24 But nevertheless this did not help the complainant. From which act of the Constance Concilii it may well be inferred what Imperial Majesty is able to do in such a case. Majesty would be able to do in such a case, even if she would like to, against the proceeding of the papal Concilii. Therefore, it behooves us to be cautious in this, as God's honor requires it most of all.

(25) But so that there is no lack of us in this, which is due before God and the world, we do not only want to offer ourselves once again for a righteous, impartial, Christian and reasonable action, but also have asked and reminded the Imperial Majesty most humbly to consider this most excellent matter and this occasion. Majesty most humbly requested and reminded that Her Majesty would graciously consider this most excellent matter and the occasion thereof, and would undertake and promote a true, right, common, Christian concilium in the German nation, in which the Pope and his clergy would not be judges over and against God and His Word and us. For we may not help to take away the honor and power that God Himself gives to His Word by the desired, our approval of the Papal Concilii, as we would otherwise do with the deed, nor would we be able to answer for it in God's court.

26) But if Pope Paul will want to show his imperial majesty in such a work, he will do so. Majesty want to be involved in this imperial work?

If we are unable to prevent the holding of a common, free, Christian council in the German nation, or if we oppose it, we hereby testify before God and all of Christendom that we have not been unjustly lacking in doing, promoting, and approving everything that faith and love require for Christian unity. Whatever disruptions, unrest, and temporal and eternal harm will occur and result from this, we will be excused, and let Pope Paul and his spiritual followers bear the blame and cause, which the Almighty will not leave unsmelled in his time.

27 And have not wished to leave all this undisclosed to Imperial Majesty Orator and Vice-Chancellor. Majesty's Oratori and Vice-Chancellor, upon other submissions made by him, for a true counter-report; also graciously request, and kindly and obligingly ask him, that he may favorably transmit the same to our further report to the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, in accordance with his request, and that he may bestow our most humble report to her Majesty. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, in accordance with his request, and to promote our most humble report to Her Majesty to the best, and to inform us Imperial Majesty as our most gracious Lord. Maj., as our most gracious Lord, in all subservience, with the offer of our most humble services. This we are graciously inclined to acknowledge and kindly and willingly earn for the sake of her Majesty's reported orators. 1237 Philipp Melanchthon's letter to Joachim Camerarius, about the deliberations at Schmalkalden concerning the Concilii. March 1, 1537.

In Melanchthon's epist., lib. IV, No. 196 and in the Oorx.

Rec, vol. iii, 291.

Translated from the Latin.

To the high and excellent, learned man, Joachim Camerarius in Tübingen, his highly esteemed friend, (Philipp Melanchthon) sends his greetings!

(1) When I learned that the meeting had been announced so that the princes might consult about a council and that we might discuss doctrine together, I came here with an extraordinarily troubled mind. For I saw beforehand what counsel the princes would have, and that, if a heated dispute arose among the theologians, more frightening things would happen.

...that discord should come of it... For I know what the mind of certain men is set on, and to whom every man intends his play to please.

(2) Luther, Pomeranus, Spalatin, Osiander, Veit, Urban Regius, and Amsdorf came here. For it is not necessary to name the others. Of those who should not be of the same opinion with ours, as one thinks, none was there but Blarer and Bucer.

(3) Now there are two reasons why a theological assembly was appointed: the first, that there might not be a vain but an exact comparison of doctrine, that the disagreement might be removed, and that there might be a right unanimous and clear doctrine in our churches. The other, that it should be decided which articles should be held fast, and such asserted to the utmost, with restraint from common tranquillity and all human things, and which, on the other hand, should be left to the pope and ecclesiastical police, in order to restore the peace and common harmony of the church, if the matter should be put to the point that anything should be yielded.

004 Now this was very good counsel, that there should be a disputation on both sides, upon our frequent complaining and speaking of it. But it has not proceeded with any part of it; for as to the things in which we ought to give way, none of the unlearned and violent minds have been of a mind to think of it. They say that it will not do us good, now that the game is to begin, to be thought unstable, not only among foreigners, but also among our own. They say that the Emperor, too, will want more and more when we once give way. All kinds of anxious thoughts come to the mind of the pious and the pious. After this, it was expressly demanded that the doctrine not be dealt with harshly, lest some dispute should increase the dissension and break the covenant. Before we came here, I saw that these dangers were hanging over us, and I warned our people in advance, but they still had good hopes.

(5) Now, lest we should lie here quite still, and be as it were dumb images, we have been commanded to set forth something of the primacy of Peter, or of the Roman pope, and of the power and jurisdiction of the bishops. This I have composed and delivered in some measure. 1)

1) From this it follows, on the one hand, that Melancthon is the author of the writing "von der Gewalt und Obrigkeit des Pabsts" (No. 1227), and on the other hand, the time of writing, namely before March 1, 1537.

(6) We have also been commanded to go through the articles of the confession a little, and to hear whoever disagrees with any article, or rejects anything of it. And the princes expressly assured us that they wanted to stick to the formula of the Concord. The conversation was very brief. Bucer spoke clearly about the Holy Sacrament and affirmed the presence of Christ, with which all of us, even those who are otherwise somewhat hard, were satisfied. Blarer taught in a rather general way: Christ is present. But afterwards he added some ambiguous things. Osiander went after him somewhat violently. But because we did not want to excite too heated a quarrel, I fell into his speech. We got on so well together that, since the others were all in agreement, this one didn't seem to contradict much either. I know well that this is not yet quite certain, but more could not be done at the time, especially in the absence of Luther, who was plagued with terrible stone pains. This is what happened with the conversation of the clergy.

(7) The princes have taken this up in consultation: whether we should refuse to go to the Concilii altogether, or promise that we would let our delegation go there, but with the reservation that the papal part would not be left to judge at all, but would be asked that, on the part of the kings and monarchs, capable people be chosen by their command to judge these disputes. This was a great and difficult consultation.

(8) It has always been our opinion not to refuse the concilii altogether, because the pope, though he cannot be judge, yet has power to declare a concilium. After that, the council must appoint judges.

(9) But some astute minds insisted that these reasons of mine were well thought out and right, but in vain, because the tyranny of the pope would be so great that if we had once consented to come to the council, they would accept it for that, as if the pope also had power from us to speak as judges. I have well seen that my opinion, though honestly meant and fair, would be somewhat dangerous. But the other opinion has prevailed, after having been violently argued now and then, so that it seems to me questionable. I see that the danger of an exceedingly great disturbance is there, if God does not avert it, although I have often said that they would be in fair need of this refusal alone, if they did nothing.

nor wanted to give in to the church police. It is most distressing to me to see that such discord will continue to our descendants, and perhaps cause a terrible barbarism and devastation of all arts and secular offices among our people. Behold, how even now some have such an appetite for this barbarism, who ought to defend themselves against it the most! We can at last console ourselves with the good cause. So the Emperor's envoy was answered: the concilium scheduled at Mantua would be rejected, and he asked that the Emperor would have a free concilium announced. The imperial envoy replied that the emperor would see to it that a proper court was appointed at the same concilium. But such speeches, which are so common, do not move ours.

There you have everything that has happened here so far. Veit left here quickly because of my suspicions. I will write accordingly if anything further happens. Luther has hardly been able to pass urine, either because of the stone in the urinary tract, or otherwise because he is prevented from doing so by viscous and stagnant mucus. Since he had been ill for eight whole days and had given up life, he wanted to leave here, even though he was very weak. Nevertheless, we let him have his way, and the very next night, when he left, he was able to pass urine again well and abundantly, praise God! Many things had been done rudely in the Cur here, the consequences of which one still has to fear. Now, however, he has a skilful and understanding physician, Sturtiades; if he had had him from the beginning, he would probably not have got into such danger. Farewell. Schmalkalden, March 1, 1537, Philipp.

1238 Causes, so the princes and sovereigns, also estates and cities of the confession of true, divine and evangelical doctrine to all kings, sovereignties and potentates of Christendom by their letter to recognize, why they Pabst Pauli, the name of the third, advertised Concilium, that on the 23rd day of May, next, at Mantua, set, justly suspicious, also to common Christian unity do not respect and hold serviceable.

March 5, 1537.

This writing came out in 1537 in Wittenberg by Georg Rau (Rhaw) in quarto under the above title. After that it was printed by Hortleder, toru. I, lib. I, enx. 29, P. 29 in German, but Latin Lünig in spleil. 6661st, tom. I, x. 445, and in the Oorp. reads. Vol. ill, 314. seckendorf, list. I, utü., lib. III, x. 147, Ackck. II, says that the writing is published both in German and Latin, afterwards translated also into French and Italian.

(1) The pope of Rome, Paul the Third, has recently issued a bull in which he has announced a common council to be held in Italy at Mantua, to begin next spring, on the 23rd day of May; he also reports some of the reasons for his approval in the reported Roman bull, why and for what reasons such a common council is to be held. In addition, the reported pope has dispatched his orators and messages to the Christian kings, princes, princes, and potentates in Germany and other nations and kingdoms, who are to further inform them of the appointed, announced 1) council, and to request them everywhere in the name of the pope, and remind and admonish them everywhere in the name of the pope to attend such council in person, or to dispatch and send their authorized attorneys, commanders, and orators to the place and time indicated with sufficient mandates and orders to appear at such council. When the recently reported message of the pope, with the above-mentioned order of his lord, also requested and similarly admonished us to appear at the council, or to send our lawyers or commanders, as the most noble and powerful prince and lord, Mr. Carolus the Fifth, Roman emperor, our most gracious lord, has graciously requested of us, has graciously sought and sought with us, our necessity requires that we manfully indicate and remind what danger, trouble, and harm, not only to us, but to common Christendom and divine truth, should be involved in the Concilium of this form, as the Pope of Rome, Paul the Third, has proclaimed and intends to hold it.

002 And although we give this answer of ours with a good conscience, after having considered and considered it with the greatest diligence, ultimately for our own and the common Christianity's need, faithful and Christian good opinion, we can nevertheless well observe that the adversaries (as we know them) make a great clamor about it to revile us, and do not interpret and interpret all this to us in any other way than to the most unpleasant and evil.

1) So put by us instead of: "exposed inscribed". In Latin: Ooneilli inäletionein.

will be. Nor can they make a greater pretence than this, to the detriment of our whole cause and known doctrine, and to the bitterness of the potentates, if they interpret our answer as if we did not want to suffer an interrogation, a judge, and a concilium. And they will only pretend that we despise all Christian nations, which have often done great deeds for the preservation of the Christian religion, and have had many famous teachers of the Christian church, and there are still praiseworthy schools among them, in which great care is taken for the Christian religion. This time, too, they will make a show of it, as if it were unchristian and contrary to all Christian ordinances, refusing to recognize the common concilii, since concilia are the highest and most proper courts in the Christian church, and should be considered by all Christians as such.

(3) Further, they shall invent, as if we were ashamed of this doctrine, and flee and shun the light. Or else, as if we had a desire for unnecessary separation and division, and could not bear that these things should be dealt with, and that Christianity should be brought to unity, and so wilfully hindered the common peace and unity of Christianity.

(4) If this were to be reported or presented by us with reason and substance (as, whether God wills it, shall never happen), it would not only be burdensome, but also quite terrible for Christians to hear. For this reason, our need and that of all Christendom, for the preservation of pure, divine truth, requires that such blasphemies and complaints be countered in a timely manner by means of this public notice to all Christian estates, and therein to all Christian kings, princes, rulers, and potentates our concern, Princes and potentates our concern, opinion and mind of the Concilio, the comforting hope, if the above-mentioned Christian kings, princes and potentates, also all learned, God-fearing, honest, honour-loving people, and German or other foreign nations in all the world, and Christian concerns, they will not only know and have us completely innocent of all fictitious charges, but will also, as is especially due to the high estates, themselves seek and encourage such things, so that in these most important, high matters of the most holy religion, they may be common to all, and high matters of the most holy religion of common Christendom, and at last to guard against so innumerable abuses, and that the pope and his followers may not be permitted, under the deceitful, coloured, and made appearance of a concilii, to violate the public divine truth by force and typhoon.

to dampen and suppress rancour. For with God's help we want to show and make true that not only our teaching is right and Christian, but also that in this matter we ourselves seek nothing but God's glory and the salvation of common Christianity, so that no wilful stubbornness or contempt may be justly attributed to us.

005 And first of all, that we do not despise the judgment of other and foreign nations, and of the common Christian church, is to be inferred from the fact that we work to see that the pope with his followers does not make himself a judge, but that this matter is moved and examined by competent, impartial people, as no doubt all God-fearing people in all countries and kingdoms desire and ask of God with heartfelt sighs.

(6) For since there are some ancient writings written in foreign nations long before this time of false doctrine, abuses, and other false worship and idolatry, so torn down, we hope there are still to this day in those same nations some such learned godly men who rightly understand the Christian doctrine, though they are oppressed by the tyranny of the pope and must keep silence. These should also be admitted to a council, so that they may safely and unabashedly present their opinions as necessary for the salvation of divine truth.

(7) For we Christian Concilium do not shun or shun at all, but, as is right, just, and necessary, encourage and ask for a free, common, Christian Concilium, in which, by impartial, God-fearing, learned men, false doctrine may be distinguished from the right, and rooted out of the church, and in which, on the other hand, right doctrine and the Word of God may be planted and preserved.

(8) On the other hand, this is not called a true Christian council, in which the pope and his followers, who forcibly protect and administer false doctrine and idolatry in the church, want to be judges themselves, and conclude and judge against God's word out of habit or self-confessed human statutes. For when our Lord Christ, the Supreme Judge of the Church, ordains and establishes who is to be judge of the infirmities of doctrine, conduct, or life, he says, Matt. 18:17: "Tell the Church." With these words he closes the hands of the tyrant and wants the church, that is, the Christian assembly, to be the judge, so that understanding, God-fearing members are not excluded from it, and especially that they judge according to God's word, not by their own human power or discretion.

009 Wherefore we beseech all Christian kings, princes, and potentates of all nations, that they will not suffer them to imagine that we hold in low esteem other learned men and godly minds that are in foreign nations, or that we hold the Christian concilia in contempt, and will not give credence to our adversaries, who, with such fancied speeches, presume to subdue Christian doctrine, and to embitter and incite princes and rulers against us.

010 Much less can it be laid to our charge that we shun the light, and are ashamed to bring our doctrine before men of understanding. For we have publicly read and presented our confession to the Roman Emperor's Majesty, our most gracious Lord, and to other sovereigns and princes 2c. in the Diet of Augsburg.

011 Thus the known doctrine of the gospel is publicly preached in our land, and diligently labored daily, that men may hear it, and learn it to the glory of God, and to the salvation of souls; even the scriptures and books of ours are in the day.

012 And many wise men among the adversaries confess that therein many high and necessary articles of Christian doctrine are again brought to light, which before had been for a long time very darkened with divers darkneses, namely, with false worship and idolatry, with monasticism, with sophistry, with divers statutes of men, and cords of conscience, as is to be seen in the theologians and canonists.

13. Now therefore, if God the Lord, out of His great mercy, grants grace to poor Christendom for the betterment of it, so that pure Christian doctrine may once again shine in the world, it is public that the abuses and errors denounced by our known doctrine have been punished, and that right doctrine has been planted against them, namely, of right repentance, of faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, how to instruct and comfort the conscience, of the grace of Christ, how to obtain forgiveness of sins, how man becomes righteous and pleasing to God, which are good works and right worship, of the right use of the sacraments, of the authority of the church and keys, of worldly authority and difference and custom of human statutes, and of other many necessary articles. Of these and such things, concerning the glory of God and the salvation of Christians, we are not at all afraid to speak before all the world, and to make a long report. And as St. Paul says: he is not ashamed of the gospel, so we also must not be ashamed of the gospel, and wish that we may speak in a free and open manner.

The Holy Father said that he would be pleased to present this doctrine, which is of the greatest need to all Christendom, to all kings, princes, potentates, and nations at the Christian Council, and that he would speak of it as necessary. Nor do we doubt that, because it is such an important and useful article, all intelligent and godly people, if they were sufficiently informed, would take great pleasure in it.

014 For this reason we heartily desire and ask for such a council, in which we and other God-fearers may be free to speak and conclude about these things according to God's word.

015 For that it should be laid to our charge, as if they had revived old and damned heresies, that therefore it should not be necessary to dispute our doctrine, or to bring it to trial: this is a public falsehood, and is soon answerable to all those who read our Confession and Apologiam. For the doctrine which we have adopted and preached is not new, but is actually and certainly the right unanimous doctrine and opinion of the Christian catholic church, as can be clearly proved by the ancient pure church testimony and the holy fathers' writings.

(16) And may say with truth, that we neither accept nor hold any heretical doctrine, nor any opinion, which disputes with the unanimous catholic old church doctrine, but in many articles the old conciliar and fathers' doctrine is again negated by ours, which had been exterminated by the pope and monks, and other, new, unchristian opinions and services are introduced instead, in which they unashamedly despise the old conciliar and fathers.

017 Finally, that it should be said against us in bitterness, as if we had a desire for separation and dissension; this is laid upon us quite unreasonably. For God is our witness that we are heartily sorry that the nations of the Christian name should be torn and separated from one another. Therefore, by the grace of God, we never want to be separated from the true unity of the Christian Catholic Church, and for this reason we desire a righteous council, so that a common, Christian and constant unity may be established and made according to God's Word.

(18) But if the pope with his own condemns the true, Christian and necessary doctrine, and for the sake of the gospel persecutes devout, learned people, and gives authority to persecute and kill them in all kingdoms and lands, God's commandment compels us and all God-fearers not to consent to such unchristian condemnation. For it is God's commandment and the highest commandment of God.

to confess and keep the word of God, as our Lord Christ says: "Whoever confesses me before men, him will I also confess before my heavenly Father; but whoever denies me before men, him will I also deny before my heavenly Father. Thus it is also against God that anyone should make himself a partaker of the tyranny and blood which the pope, in order to extinguish right doctrine, cruelly sheds, and gives others to shed.

(19) In addition, it is public that we have always compared ourselves with other princes, rulers, and estates in the Roman Empire and in common matters of the Empire, and that we have helped to maintain peace; from this it is to be assumed that in religion, if it is possible with God, we also prefer to see and keep unity.

020 Then we also understand well what great burden and danger we have to expect because of these things. For the popes have often let themselves be heard now for many years that they are practicing and working to the utmost to arouse the kings against us and to exterminate us. We would not burden ourselves and our countries and people with such great danger if we did not recognize our guilt as Christians to be obedient to God's commandments and to put and dare everything in danger for the sake of the Gospel, for the salvation of divine truth. God is also our witness that we do not protect and manage this religious trade with such great daily danger and expense out of any other request, but solely out of the recognition of our Christian duty before God; for this reason, we ask all kings, princes, rulers and potentates not to let our adversaries imagine otherwise.

21st Now that we have rejected this unfounded suspicion, in order that the adversaries may be pleased to accuse us, we hope that all those to whom this writing comes will listen the more willingly and take note of what we will report from the written Concilio, through Pope Paul the Third.

(22) Perhaps some in foreign nations, who are not sufficiently informed of these affairs, think that we have, out of presumption, contested some minor defects which, in order to prevent discord, might have been concealed and tolerated, especially because it is found that this human nature and life is still so weak everywhere that abuses and defects always remain in governments and elsewhere, so that, for the sake of peace, one must have patience.

023 But these things are much different: therefore we pray thee, let no man deceive us so. think. For first, to false doctrine and error we must not be silent, as our Lord Christ earnestly commanded, "Beware of false prophets." Secondly, this controversy is not of little abuse. For in this part the doctrine of faith and right knowledge of Christ is chiefly dealt with, which is the chief part of a Christian being and right worship. Therefore this article cannot be concealed, but it is most necessary that it be kept pure in the church, and preached with earnestness. Now it is undeniable that this article has been entirely eradicated in the papal doctrine of the monks, and that false doctrine has been introduced in its place to the shame of Christ. We also punish others for much error and idolatry. For this reason, long before this time, many learned, God-fearing, Christian people cried out for a common, free, Christian council, in which they would all consider and advise how to help the whole of Christendom, and at the same time put an end to error and idolatry, so that unity and uniformity would nevertheless be maintained among the nation.

(24) Now in our time a free Christian council is much more necessary, because the same old infirmities still remain for and for in foreign countries, and at the same time a discord has arisen, because of which in many places many pious, God-fearing people are tyrannically persecuted and executed solely for the sake of Christian doctrine.

25. For these highly important reasons, not only we, but also the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, princes, princes, and bishops of the German nation, after much deliberation at many imperial congresses, have considered and decided that the church's highest, unavoidable need requires that a common, free, Christian council be assembled, in which the pure Christian doctrine of God's Word should be preserved, and false doctrine, abuses, and idolatry, on the other hand, should be done away with. For the imperial majesty and the estates have well considered that a council would bring more discord and disruption if it were not conducted in this manner and form, namely, that it should be free and Christian, that is, in which one should speak according to God's word, and not according to custom or human statutes that are contrary to God's word; since also the pope and his followers should not be judges, but the matters in dispute should be considered and examined by impartial, competent people.

026           Such           a           concilium           have           we           desired,           and

We have appealed to such a common, free, Christian council. And if we are in need of such a council, the pope recently issued a call for a council that is quite inappropriate for the aforementioned imperial and imperial concerns and decisions, and has no form of free, Christian council.

27. Now that this matter of religion concerns all of common Christendom, and not only to indicate what danger we, but rather common Christendom, have to fear on account of the aforementioned announced council, we have deemed it necessary to send this letter to all kings, princes, and potentates, indicating why we do not consider this council, which the pope has announced and intends to hold with this measure and form, to be equal, nor useful to Christendom, and therefore to ask that all Christian kings and potentates, in order to promote God's honor and the salvation and blessedness of Christendom, will use diligence so that a free, Christian concilium may be held, in which not the pope with his own may be judges, but in which learned, God-fearing people may be heard according to need and confess God's word without hindrance, and the matters in dispute may be ordered to be examined by impartial, competent people. For where the matters in dispute are not heard and held in a right and Christian manner, Christianity is not helped, and the council will bring about more disruption than peace.

(28) The supreme judgment in the Christian church belongs not to the pope and bishops alone, but to the Christian church. That is, not only to the bishops, but also to all kings, princes, and estates, which are all members of the Christian church. Therefore, even if the pope were not so publicly involved in this present religious matter, he is not to be allowed to be the sole judge with his own, and to deprive the other members of the Christian church and estates of their right, but the whole church should justly use and retain its power.

(29) Much less should the pope and his followers be permitted to be judges in this matter of religion, in which he and his followers are publicly involved. For not only written laws, but much more the immutable divine and natural laws, so also formed by God in all men's hearts and reason, teach that no one should be permitted to be judge in his own matters. Now we accuse the pope and his own, and the dispute is not of small matters. For we dispute not only about his splendor and glory, or about the temporal

But we punish his doctrines, statutes, and false services, which he devises, administers, and protects by force against the word of God; this is as much as accusing the pope of idolatry and heresy. In these most important cases, the ancient canons themselves state that not the pope, but the common Christian church should be the judge.

030 Moreover, the pope is not only a part, but has made himself quite suspect by having previously condemned our doctrine in many ways. For the pope Oso äselniis has issued a bull in which the doctrine, as we know it, is also condemned, and is condemned annually in the dulln Coeurs. Thus also the pope gives to hold all those for heretics and to exterminate them who accept our known doctrine. Since the pope has so often condemned us and our doctrine before the concilium was announced, it is not probable that such a papal concilium should speak differently or less harshly against his own bulls.

(31) There is no way to hope that the pope will allow anyone else, except according to his custom, to speak and have voesur äsoisivurn. For the pope in his proclamation suffers no other understanding of the Concilio, than that these alone have the Concilium, and to conclude and voesrn ckseisivnrn, namely, the pope, cardinals, and bishops, and that no one else shall have any voice. Wherefore also the council is thus written, that it alone requires those who are attached to it.

For this reason, we consider this announced concilium to be suspicious, because in the announcement the pope allows nothing to be said about the trial, and does not deign to have this most important matter interrogated before unsuspected, impartial persons, but instead calls for such a concilium with clear, expressed words only his own, and those who are bound to him with terrible oaths and curses. From this it is easy to see what kind of trial he intends to hold, and that he wants to be a judge in his own cause, even if he is a party.

033 If then we consented to his concilium thus appointed, the pope would afterwards interpret it as if we had consented to him as judge and president of the concilii, and granted to him and his associates that they should order, judge, and conclude the proceedings as they pleased.

34 Thirdly, the Bulla, wherein the Concilium is written, gives sufficient cause for refusing and recusing the Concilium. For in this same writing we are immediately condemned. For since the pope has shown cause why he should

If the pope has called for a concilium, there is no request that the matters in dispute be heard by impartial, competent people according to necessity, but it is only reported that he is causing this concilium to be assembled in order to eradicate the heresy that has recently arisen. And even though these are common words, set up for the sake of appearances, there is no doubt that the Pope's opinion touches our well-known doctrine. For it is to be taken into account that he does not want to call his abuses and errors heresy, and that he will not offer to eradicate them in a public proclamation.

(35) And so that there should be no doubt as to who is meant, he issued another Bulla of the Reformation of the Court after the Concilii had been proclaimed, wherein the cause of the proclaimed Concilii was raised. In the same bulla the pope states our doctrine in clear words, and says: the Concilium was appointed for the eradication of the poisonous Lutheran doctrine: <sup>^6</sup> sxsUrxutionerri pestikerus OutUtzrunue Uusrssis. Thus the pope has cunningly concealed the name in the previous bulla, so that the writing would nevertheless have quite a semblance, and yet has given his mind and prejudice to be understood, and has expressed this afterwards in the other bulla. Therefore, it is undoubtedly the pope's final opinion that he appointed this council not to allow any disputation of the doctrine, or to hear anyone, but to act alone to eradicate our known doctrine as a heresy, previously condemned by him. Therefore, we would not be in our right mind if we consented to such a dangerous proclamation. For in so doing we confirmed this falsehood to the pope, and confessed that the Christian doctrine which we accepted should be heresy, and undertook to eradicate and exterminate the same. For this is the essence of the Bulla, which is quite dangerous.

036 First, it is the opinion of the pope that all those who accept the Bulla confess by such acceptance that our known doctrine is heresy, as the Bulla in principle means and gives to be understood.

(37) The pope has also committed the kings, princes, and potentates with such acceptance that they will help to eradicate such doctrine. If one wishes to speak the truth freely and without all sophistry, one must confess that this, and no other, is the bulla of sound opinion and right understanding. Therefore, if we would consent to this expulsion, we would condemn our doctrine ourselves before we would enter into it. would come to the interrogation. Because these matters affect the common Christianity, we ask all kings, princes, and potentates to take good note of the pope's cunning and dangerous actions.

(38) It is also reasonable to wonder why the form of the Bull is not made the same, but is made so dangerous, whether it is perhaps meant to deter us from the Conciliar, or to see us secretly, that we might be reproached for having confessed, by accepting the Bull, that our doctrine is unjust and heretical. But we consider that the pope sought this in particular, so that he obliged and entrapped the Christian kings, princes, potentates, and nations, that they should have confessed with the acceptance of the bull that our doctrine was heretical, and [they] consented to destroy it.

(39) There is no doubt in our minds that the Emperor's Majesty, our most gracious Lord, is of serious opinion and mind, that she would like in these great matters that God's glory be glorified and common Christendom be blessedly and rightly helped, and that constant peace and unity be established. Therefore we take care that His Imperial Majesty has no pleasure in this. Therefore, we take care that His Imperial Majesty has no pleasure in this unequal and dangerous form of the written Concilii, in which the Pope has previously condemned us and cunningly dared to entrap us.

40 Fourthly, in this bull there is no thought at all as to how the proceedings are to be conducted. If, then, it should be proceeded with, that those who come to the council should take the judgment from the writ, namely, that this doctrine is heretical, and that no further mention of it should be made according to necessity, but that it should be concluded at once that they all want to exterminate and destroy this doctrine of ours by force, then it is public that we have just cause not to consent to such a tyrannical council, that we have just and necessary reasons not to consent to such a tyrannical concilium, which is quite unlike an ecclesiastical court and proper concilium, in which one should hear the doctrine and judge according to the Word of God, not according to custom or the laws of men, as we have always desired such a hearing in a free, Christian concilium.

41 And because we fully believe that Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, will be pleased to help and advise Christianity. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, that Christianity be rightly and constantly helped and counseled, and that these important matters be explained and right salutary doctrine be planted, Her Imperial Majesty will no doubt take no pleasure in this unequal and unjust form of the Concilii that has been written out.

have. For the pope, as far as we are concerned, has not proclaimed a council, but has rather issued a judgment against us, in which he condemns us and condemns us terribly. After this, he has also spread out the other bull about the reformation of the court, in which he condemns our known doctrine by name, so that the opinion of his previous bull may be thoroughly understood. For this reason, he asks us to agree to this challenge of his. If we did so, we would have condemned ourselves with our own consent. However, we do not want to speak any further about these weak lists used by the pope, but we ask all kings and potentates, and all those who have an understanding, to let them know how unequal, deceitful, and dangerous this letter is.

(42) Fifthly, it is certain that the pope will not suffer these disputed matters of religion to be judged according to the word of God and the writings of the apostles, but will judge them from papal statutes, custom, the doctrine of men, and some recent conciliarities, and will not allow him to dispute the papal statutes in any way. Now in this controversy the main thing is that human statutes which are contrary to God's commandment are to be rejected as erroneous and ungodly and are not to be valid. We also accept and faithfully hold the unanimous doctrine of the Christian Catholic Church, but the Pabst's error and tyranny should not be adorned with the holy church's name. The common Christian church of the holy fathers did not accept the statutes that are contrary to God's word, nor did it give the pope such intemperate power as he himself ascribes to him. In addition, the mob that condemns the pure doctrine of the Gospel and cruelly persecutes and murders innocent people on account of Christian doctrine is not called the oatliolioa 6ool68ia Oliristi, but is the bloodthirsty and accursed Cain's mob and descendants.

(43) Thus, we have not introduced any new doctrine into the Church, but we have renewed and brought to light the old unanimous doctrine of the common Christian Church by the grace of God. On the other hand, the pope and the monks have invented and introduced new doctrine and new worship contrary to God's word and the common doctrine of the old, common Christian Church. For this reason, Christianity needs a council, so that it may be judged not by custom or the statutes of men, but by the Word of God, which is light and transfigured by the united confession of the common Christian church.

44 Such things also have often happened in the church before, that pious and Christian bishops have not wished to attend the concilia, ordinarily and properly appointed, when they noted that these concilia were not intended to save the truth, but to strengthen unchristian doctrine, or the tyranny of the bishops. As namely:

(45) The emperor Constantius assembled a great and noble council at Antioch; Maximus, the bishop of Jerusalem, would not come to it, though Antioch was not far from Jerusalem. For he knew what the emperor's mind was inclined to do, even what some of the bishops, companions of Arian, practiced, who had brought the benevolent emperor to their side.

046 Athanasius, though he came to Tyro to the Concilium, departed from it again soon to the emperor, because he saw that the nobles of the Concilio wished to be judges and accusers, and had themselves secretly appointed men to accuse him, Athanasius, falsely.

47 At Sirmio in Hungary a great council was held against Photinus, for the matter was important. Although the emperor commanded the bishops to come there, the bishops in the Occident stayed away when they noticed that the Arian group had arrived there strong and large, and they suspected that they would want to conclude something to the detriment of the true doctrine. Now there was a bishop in Hispania, Osius Oordubeusis, who had a great reputation; therefore the Arians labored, that the emperor especially required him. So Osius came, even though he otherwise intended to remain outside, and this did not turn out well. For he also consented to the fraudulent K^rudoluiu 8irmi6N86, from which much disruption followed, and for this reason Osius is severely scolded by Hilario, who was not there.

48 Cyril, a bishop of Jerusalem, also would not come into the Concilia of those who disputed it, and is said to have been the first to do so.

who appealed in writing from Concilien.

49 A council was also begun at Medio lan, and the bishops were required by the emperor. Nevertheless, when Paulinus, bishop of Trier, and a few others noticed that Auxentius, bishop of Mediola, and his companions were not holding out anything good, they soon broke out and gave cause for the concilium to be broken up. So these high people fled suspicious concilia, so that they would not be held responsible if something had been done against God's honor.

050 Therefore we beseech all those who have understanding, that we also not be reproached for shying away from the suspicious papal council, since the pope lets himself be heard clearly that such a council is to be held to strengthen his power and his abuses.

51) Sixthly, the time when the Council is to be held is difficult for us for many important reasons.

52 For it is appointed in Italy, where the pope can easily gather together many of his followers, to overrule or deter the others, that they may not freely speak their opinion. If the Concilium were set in Germany, all nations would have more liberty and security to speak and confess the truth.

Moreover, our adversaries have blasphemed us atrociously in foreign nations, and have forbidden the reading of our Scriptures, so that many people in foreign nations have drawn much evil suspicion of us from such poison poured in by the adversaries, as if all religion and discipline had been done away with in our country. Now such suspicion brings no small danger in interrogation and action, therefore it would also be very useful for this reason that the Concilium be held in Germany, that the foreigners themselves see our church order, regiment and order in churches and cities, so that they do not show themselves more violently against the truth and right doctrine through false suspicion.

54. In these great matters, which concern the honor of God and the salvation of souls, it is necessary that we, the princes and rulers of a good part, and also some of our kinsmen, counts, and lords, be present in person in the council, if proper interrogations or actions are to be taken: If we were to go so far from our lands and principalities and leave them open to danger and adversaries, it would be a great hardship for us.

Finally, for many great and important reasons, it has been considered in the Empire for the best and most beneficial improvement and peace of common Christianity that a free Christian council should be established and held in the German country. Now we do not yet know the reason why such a concilium should have been proposed by Imperial Maj. Maj. and the common misgivings of the princes and chieftains.

056 We have shown cause why we think this concilium, as the pope hath written it out, to be justly suspect; for though the pope be part, and hath oftentimes condemned us before, before the matter came to trial, yet will he, with his

In his own cause he will be judge in the Concilio. Moreover, he does not let it be known at all that he wants to have the matter heard in a Christian, proper way, but has already condemned us in his writ of unheard and unrecognized matter; therefore we cannot consent to such a writ of conciliation.

57 For this reason we beseech all kings, princes, and potentates of all nations not to give credence to our adversaries, if they will interpret and interpret our answer given by the Council in an evil and hateful way, but to consider and judge the causes which we have now told, for we fully hope that from this they will sufficiently judge that our answer is just and Christian.

(58) For it is public that we cannot allow the pope and his followers to be both part and judge. Thus we cannot consent to a concilium before we understand how the proceedings are to be conducted, whether they are to be judged according to human statutes and customs, which are contrary to the word of God, or whether the word of God is to be preferred.

059 For if we should thus carelessly consent to this concilium, which the pope has written out in this form, we should afterwards suffer the pope and his own to be judges. For he would take this against us, that we had consented to this Concilium, when our appeal has been made to a common, free, Christian Concilium. And this is not a sought-after or colored cause, but a well-founded, Christian, and most necessary concern. For the reason is that we need to know beforehand how the interrogations are to be held, and whether God's word is to be preferred to human statutes and customs; we also hope that all God-fearing and understanding people will approve of this reason of ours. The form in which the Conciliar is written is so unequal that, if we had consented to it, we would already have condemned ourselves.

60. Since this high and most important matter concerns the salvation, blessedness, and peace of the common Christianity, and since God has seriously commanded the highest heads, kings, princes, and potentates, to protect and handle it, we ask that they take up this matter for the praise of God and for the benefit of the common Christianity, will take up this cause, and use all diligence and work for such a council to be held, thereby helping Christendom, doing away with unchristian doctrine and false worship, and establishing Christian unity, namely, a common, free, Christian council, in which, freely, according to the law, all Christians will be able to live in harmony.

God's word be concluded and spoken. This is the highest benefit that kings and princes can bestow upon the common Christian church and all its descendants. Moreover, it is the most sacred service that God has made most pleasing to Him.

61. For the pope seeks and thinks to maintain and strengthen his unjust power, abuses, and idolatry through the kings and potentates, and that the kings and potentates persecute and kill innocent and God-fearing people with unjust cruelty on account of Christian doctrine, Let all great lords be justly afraid of this, because they have been raised by God to such majesty that they should praise the divine name and honor, and promote the holy gospel, and protect and save the innocent people, and especially those who are in danger because of Christian doctrine and right faith.

(62) Where such a common, free, Christian concilium is held, and the doctrine according to God's Word is allowed to be examined by competent, impartial people, then, by God's grace, we want to give an account of our known doctrine, as we are obligated to do, and to show ourselves in all actions in such a way that it may be found that we seek nothing but God's glory and the common Christianity's salvation and lasting peace. To this end, may God grant His grace. Date Schmalkalden, on the 5th of March, in the year 1537.

1239 A question of the whole Order of the Card Players of the Spoon 1) to the Concilium of Mantua. Anno 1537.

This writing is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. II, p. 374; in the Altenburg edition, vol. VI, p. 1087 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XXI, p. 162. That it was not to be attributed to Luther was already indicated by Walch through the writing chosen for printing.

1st Having learned, most holy Father, that your Holiness has already settled all matters concerning the Council, has already reformed the Roman Court (which is supposed to be impossible), has made the whole of Rome pious (this is to be believed), has well staffed all the Churches everywhere (as is evident), and has eradicated all heresies, especially the Lutheran, and thus has made vain saints among the people of Rome.

1) "Karnöffel" (or Carnöffel). This was the name of the "jack" in the card game. See St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 774, amn. 4. We have considered, so that your Holiness would have something to do in the Council, and would not come together in vain, to present an important, excellent, and highly important question, since the whole world is in need of power. For many a great evil, murder, blood, violence, and injustice could be avoided in this, if one were to take a serious look at it. And this is the question:

(2) Why does the spoon sting the emperor and the pope, if he is, according to the interpretation of many highly intelligent people, a bad lansquenet, and the captain a traveler, the emperor an emperor, the pope a pope?

3rd Further, why the pope is called Sees 2) or Sixes, and also stabs the emperor with all the cavalry and lansquenets, except for the spoon, that is, the chosen lansquenet?

(4) Further, why is the devil devilless, that neither emperor nor pope nor spoon can sting him, when the pope is God's governor, a lord in hell?

5th Further, why the chosen thousand, the least and poorest piece on the map, is called the emperor.

006 Many think that the pope hath robbed and stolen too much from him, that he must be a beggar, and yet be called emperor, because a chosen six hath three times as much as a thousand; wherefore it is no wonder that the threefold crown doth overthrow the simple crown of the emperor.

007 Further, how is it that the pope, who is the most holy and an earthly god (where the lawyers do not lie), is so near the devil, and much more than the emperor? For if the Sees (the pope) still had an Ees, he would be the evil Seven, the wicked devil himself, very far from the Thousand, which is the emperor.

(8) Strange opinions arise here among the doctors of our church. Some think that the pope would like to be the devil himself. Others say that he was. The third (with whom more agree) believe that he is without means under the devil, that he rides him and rules according to his will. The fourth (and there are not many of them) say that it is all true that the pope was the devil, that he would like to become or remain the devil, and that he still lets himself be ridden by the devil, who sits above him as the egg sits above the devil.

2) Compare the saying: "Taus Eß hat nicht" 2c. St. Louis Edition, Vol. VIII, 1905 and the note, thereto.

Lake. The Lutherans hold such things, but they are now extinct in Mantua before the Council. Therefore their thing is nothing, neither are they of our church.

9th Further: And why, nevertheless, the lazy fritter stabs the ten or the paneer, about this many a heresy and error have arisen in the holy church of the card players (where one washes the glasses, and the dead men's legs run over the tables) 1).

(10) Some think that the lazy friar is the lazy monks who eat up the goods of the rich citizens and peasants.

011 Others say, They are the useless, damned canons, which shamefully devour and waste the goods of kings, princes, and lords.

(12) There are also great errors in the other leaves. For example, why the third stings the upper man, the fourth the lower man. This doctor holds this, that one holds that. And the little ship of our church is in great danger under such tides and waves that it would almost sink. For some hold that the third is the high cardinals and bishops, who like to hover over kings and princes. The fourth are the abbots and monastery saints, who like to ride above the other travellers, as counts, knights and nobles. For still none of them can get above the Taus, the emperor. They are not sorry for that, they know it well. Others interpret it differently, that we must suffer.

013 And there are many such dangerous questions in the aforesaid holy church of the brethren, called card-players, out of which come many an error, discord, and great mischief, even to brawling and fighting. And there is no other remedy here, except that a holy council at Mantua (because there is nothing else to be done) should take the matter seriously, and see to it that such errors are settled, and that they are put into certain main articles.

Doctor Martinus Luther.

If I were not so inclined and had no desire to do what is annoying to the devil and his papacy, before God's glory can come from it, I would not have undertaken to translate this piece from the holy spiritual law, because it is so disgraceful, desperate, evil Latin. But it should be so, that the shameful, desperate, evil lie would be described with no other than with such shameful, desperate, evil Latin. And it would also be fair to interpret it with shameful, desperate, evil German, as I might have done. But because it is useful for us Germans to know what shameful, desperate, evil abomination under the shameful, desperate, evil papacy we have worshipped and believed to be truth, I must do the best I can and translate the shameful, desperate, evil Latin and lies with good, understandable and clear German, intelligible and clear German, so that we may be the more certain that we are not acting against God, nor against his holy Church, where we attack the papal Church with lies and abominations, but against the devil himself, and his damned school of jacks, who advocate the truth.

He therefore that hath ears to hear, let him hear a womanly, fat, fat, well-fed, a right papal lie. For so it is in the spiritual law, Dist. 96. c. Constantinus.

The Emperor Constantine has given to the Apostles<sup>a</sup> the imperial crown and all imperial glory in Rome and in the French lands, and everything that is in the Emperor's evening. For in St. Sylvestri Legendis (which the holy pope Gelastus<sup>b</sup>) reports in the Concilio, where 70 bishops were in attendance, that it is read by the right Christians, and many other churches, according to ancient custom, also read it) it says thus:

- a) Apostolic) So he calls himself, just as if the other churches were not apostolic, nor other bishops also apostolic; he alone is apostolic.
b) Gelastus) means a ridiculous one, whose name belongs here.

The emperor Constantinus, the fourth day after his baptism, he gave this liberty to the bishop of the Roman church, that all the bishops and priests throughout the Roman empire should hold him for the head <sup>c</sup>), as the judges do a king 2c. In the same liberty, among others, it is thus read:

- c) Main) as Christ teaches: You shall be brothers and none shall be called the greatest, Matth. 18, 3.

We consider it good, together with our princes and all our council, lords, and all the people who are subject to the Empire of the Roman Church, that, just as St. Peter is considered to have been set up on earth as a governor of the Son of God, so also the following bishops of the prince of the apostles should have higher authority and rule on earth than our imperial gracious majesty is considered to have, and should have this from us and our empire. -

Choose us also the same prince of the apostles, or his governors <sup>d</sup>) to be certain <sup>e</sup>) patrons before God.

- d) Governor) As one finds described in the smoke hole, at Babylon, under the fifth brick.
e) certain) How can it be uncertain, because Christ does not want to be a patron!

And as our earthly imperial power, so we will glorify his holy Roman church, and exalt the most holy see of St. Peter higher than our emperorship and earthly throne with all glory. Give him imperial power, honor, authority and dignity, and have commanded that he be the supreme prince, not only over the four sees of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem and Constantinople, but also over all the churches of God in the whole world on earth. 1) And that the holy Roman Church, which shall be bishop at all times, shall be supreme 1) and prince over all the bishops in the whole world, and that all the

- 1) In the old editions: "high".

The judgement of the court shall decide on matters concerning the worship and faith of Christians, whether to provide for them or to confirm them.

- f) Chairs) Which were not yet at that time. Also who would have commanded the emperor to do this, and could still command?

And further on:

We have given to the churches of the holy apostles Peter and Paul goods and outworks 2) for the preservation of the lights, and have richly endowed them with various goods for this purpose. For by our holy imperial command we have provided, both in the morning and in the evening, also from midnight and from noon, namely, in Judea, Graecia, Asia, Thrace, Africa, Italia, and all kinds of islands, that our gifts shall be given to him charitably, <sup>g</sup>) and in such a way that by the will of our most holy father Sylvestri, the most high bishop, and of his descendants [will] 3) everything shall be ordered.<sup>h</sup>

- g) Also to sell indulgences, bulls, butterbills, and to plunder all monasteries and fiefs.
(h) ordered) To be wrecked, pillaged, and most shamefully wronged, by the vilest knaves that the earth hath borne.

And further on:

To St. Sylvestro and all his descendants we now presently give Lateran, our imperial palace, 4) <sup>i</sup>) then the imperial hat, namely the crown of our head, with the beautiful white bonnet and the scarf which an emperor is accustomed to wear on his neck, also the purple mantle and rosy skirt, and all imperial garments. We will also give him an imperial scepter, all kinds of flags and banners, and all kinds of imperial splendor, so that he may ride and march in all our imperial heights, power, and honors.

- i) Also the golden breach, made of pure Arabian gold behind, of Jewish gold in front, with two rubies behind, like the jars of vinegar, and two emeralds in front, like the eggs of the ostrich, to be used for the holy of holies in the bath.

Also to the most venerable priests of all ranks, who serve the holy Roman church, <sup>k</sup>) we command that they shall have such height, special power, and glory, <sup>l</sup>) as our most noble council is adorned and honored, that they may be the noblest Romans and councilors.

- 2) In the old editions: "Vorwerg".
3) So put by us instead of: "that he by ... all things shall be ordered".
4) "Palatz" ==

palace.

And we command that they also be adorned with all other imperial dignities. And as the imperial majesty is adorned with men of war, so we will also adorn the clergy of the holy Roman church. The imperial majesty must also have appointed various offices, such as chamberlains, priests, and all kinds of assistants; so we will also have adorned the holy Roman church.

k) serve) Such lies help strengthen.

l) Here the Cardinals are conceived and born.

And that the beauty of the Roman supreme bishop may shine forth most exquisitely, we command that the clergy of the same Roman church ride horses adorned with the beautiful white cloths and deuces.

And as our council wears white furs on their boots, so shall they also shine in white, that the heavenly being may become like the earthly, to the praise of God.

Above all, however, we permit St. Sylvestro and his descendants by our commandment that whomever he wills to consecrate to the ecclesiastical state, or to have ordered among the monks in monasteries, this shall be at his pleasure, according to his own discretion<sup>m</sup> and no one everywhere shall presume to set himself proudly against it.

(m) discretion) Perhaps he means that no bishop, abbot, provost, or other spiritual person shall be elected or appointed by anyone, but the pope alone shall be God and creator. Or, where he would like to have a kingdom or large estates, he may depose kings and rich people, consecrate them as priests, and push them into the monasteries; no one should object.

We also command that he and his descendants, in honor of the most holy St. Peter, shall wear the imperial hat which we gave him from our head, made of pure gold and precious stones. Although he, the most holy pope, does not want to use the golden crown over the priestly crown, which he wears in honor of the most holy St. Peter.

n) Crown) plate St. Peter.

But the white bonnet, which glitters with great whiteness and signifies the resurrection of the Lord, we have placed on his most holy head with our own hands, and in honor of St. Peter we have kept the bridle of his horse and given him the office of a groom. And we order that all his descendants especially need such white bonnets when they ride out, as the emperors are wont to do, in order that the height of the papal

The kingdom shall not be held in low esteem, but shall be adorned with higher power and glory, neither of which is the dignity of the earthly emperor.

Now therefore we give and leave unto the most holy bishop and pope over all our palace, and the city of Rome, and all the countries, cities, and places in the which country, and that which lieth toward the west, and command with these things that they shall be governed by him and his posterity. And will that all things remain so of the holy Roman church.

For this reason, we have seen fit to turn our emperors and the image of the empire toward the east, and in the country near Byzantium, in the best place, to build a city after our name, and there to establish our emperors. For it is not right that an earthly emperor should have power in the place where the supreme bishopric and the head of Christendom, founded by the heavenly emperor, is located.

All these things, which we have commanded and confirmed by our holy imperial authority and other holy commandments, we will keep unchanged and unchanged until the end of the world.

Therefore we testify before the living God, who has commanded us to reign, and before a fine and terrible judgment, all our succeeding emperors, all princes and lords, also our noble council and all the people of the whole world, from now on until eternity, that no one shall dare to commit or disturb such a thing.<sup>o</sup>

o) That is sanctifying God's name!

But if anyone here (which we do not believe) should be a sacrilegious man or a despiser, he shall be bound and subjected to eternal<sup>p</sup> damnation, and shall have both here and there the saints of God, St. Peter and Paul, the princes of the apostles, for enemies, and shall burn and perish with the devil and all the ungodly in the lowest hell).

p) eternal) Behold, can the emperors also cast souls into hell?

Here stands (praise God!) no amen.

We have confirmed this imperial commandment with our own hand and placed it on the venerable body of St. Peter. Given at Rome, on the thirtieth day of March. r)

r) Martii) That is fifteen miles after St. Christopher's day, even in the fifth year after the last day.

(1) This sacred article of the sacred spiritual law has been so enforced and administered by successive popes, that whoever would not believe, or doubt, such impudent devilish lies and blasphemies, must be one of the worst heretics. And whoever is still under the pope's power must worship such a manifest devil, or be burned to ashes, or at least keep silent, and speak nothing against it; for the most holy father pope is concerned, because he has always sought to become emperor and God, until he has finally fulfilled it, and brought this article into force. Some jurists of imperial law, who are called Doctores legum, have said so much about it, that such Donatio Constantini has no power, because it is detrimental to the coming emperors. But the lawyers of asses, or of papal law, who are called "Doctors" äscrstorum, must dance like the pope whistles.

(2) A learned, excellent man, called Laurentius Valla, a Roman, who still lived almost in man's time, opposed it, and [in] the first writing challenged it, although he did almost cleanly with the bride on the stone path, and did not attack the red murderous, damned whore of Rome as unwashed as Luther did; nor did the Roman devil and idol set his hellhounds on him, the preaching monks, so heretical masters, hot and hot. Nor did the Roman devil and idol set his infernal dogs on him, the preaching monks, who are called heretics, and would have burned him if he had not escaped and fled to King Alfonso at Naples, even though he was of a great and high family at Rome. For this holy papal lie (like all the devil's other lies) is too tender, will not be touched nor touched. For it is gladly worshipped as a god, and now accustomed to sit in the place of God, and to eat the food of the feet, and cannot bear to be called lies, and to be called by their right name.

(3) In St. Sylvester's Lying, which was invented by a lying master, it says, among other things, how the emperor Constantine was afflicted with an unusual leprosy, called Elephantia, which cannot be cured with any medicine but human blood; so he undertook to gather children from all the countries and to kill them, in order that a bath might be made of human blood would be made. But he went back, but was baptized by Sylvestro, the bishop of Rome, where he was healed, and therefore gave such a donation to the see of Rome, as the text of the sacred law says. You may read this further in this lie, for it is very good, and is well established as a papal lie.

(4) The Historia Tripartita says that Constantine, out of special devotion, had intended to be baptized in the Jordan, since Christ himself had baptized him; for which reason he also delayed the baptism. However, he was prevented by the empire's business and wars, so that he finally fell ill, sailed from Constantinople across the sea, and was baptized and died at Nicomedia in the suburbs or village. Which part is right here, let me judge who can. For the two bishops, Rome and Constantinople, have always vied for authority, and each has wanted Constantine for himself, and through him to become emperor of the world and god.

(5) But because the pope and his, such impudent liars, lie otherwise and without all this, I believe them in this much less than the Äripartite histories, which is otherwise considered true in all things. For he who is a public liar, whether God sometimes gives him a true word, is not believed, as the Greek proverb or "Cür'ässi LoMism" testifies: 81 mentiris, etiam Huoä verum ckieis, wsntiris: If you deny, it is also a lie, even if you tell the truth. For the devil also often saith true, and yet lieth in soothsaying. Again, he that is a true man, though he speak a false thing deceitfully, yet is it not counted a lie, because he spake it not as a liar.

006 Therefore, because the lie of Sylvester is a certain lie, and the whales themselves say that such leprosy did not exist in the French lands at that time, it is to be considered that Constantine was not baptized at Rome, nor delivered from such leprosy by baptism, nor perhaps did Sylvester ever see or hear of it; and therefore all that the Pope's hypocrites write of Constantine's baptism is falsehood.

007 Now therefore, to the lies of the sacred text, first of all, is it true that Constantinus

Why has he not publicly demanded and possessed it in so many hundreds, that is, twelve hundred years? (For it is almost so long that Constantine lived.) Why does he not, even to this day, issue letters that he is king in French, Hispanic, English, Hungarian, Bohemian, Polish, and Danish lands, and over sea in Africa, Numidia, and in German lands, for such lands belong to the ancient Roman Empire or Occidental Empire? Are not these lies enough, which have been proven with twelve hundred years, and still with the work before their eyes?

8. In addition, our German emperors, when the dukes of Saxony, Ottones and Henrici, held Rome and Welsh five hundred years ago, deposed and installed popes, and conferred all the bishoprics, as all the histories testify, until the double archbishops, Pope Boniface Octavus, and afterwards John the Twenty-second, and Benedictus the Twelfth, came, and began to take the city of Rome, and deposed the council, and made it Rome, as now their brother doth in Halle, the infernal 1) cardinal.

9. For it is this Boniface, a chief rogue above all rogues, and a cunning knave above all knaves, who first began the golden year to Romans, and set up the indulgences, the shameful, cursed idolatry, so that hitherto the true indulgence or remission of sins, purchased for us by the blood of Christ, has been so miserably obscured and despised; And yet all succeeding popes have held fast to such lies and idolatry unto this day, and will not yet let it be a lie and idolatry. For it has borne money without measure; they do not like to lose it. They have also strengthened papal power, which they will not willingly leave, and are all good Bonifacists to this day, remaining even where God would not resist.

010 This Boniface it is that deposed king Philip of France, and let go a sentence, because the king would not obey him against the Columnes, whom the most holy king of the kingdom of France had sent to him.

1) Wittenberg and Jena: "infernal"; Walch and the Erlangen: "infernal".

If he had expelled Father Boniface out of great courage, but had kept and maintained them in disobedience to his holiness, he must have been banished; and not only banished, but his whole kingdom would have fallen to the Roman church, and to the most holy Boniface. So he wanted to be hereditary king of France through the ban. Just as if the bishop of Brandenburg had willfully exiled the Elector of Saxony, and thereby wanted to be hereditary Elector of Saxony. Or if the bishop of Meissen, out of pure malice, banished the Elector of Brandenburg, or Duke George of Saxony, and thereby wished to become Elector of Brandenburg, and Duke of Saxony. And the priest of Wittenberg would like to play such a game with the most daring 2) citizens or peasants who were rich or powerful. Truly, one could easily become lord and god of the world!

11. But King Philip was nevertheless quite a Lutheran in his time; he pursued the most holy father Bonifacio through the expelled Columnesians, until he caught him in his own father's house, in the chamber in which he was born, and threw him, in 3) the devil's name, into a dungeon, where he died of suffering in thirty days: So that God showed that he should not go higher than his birth could, and left behind him this title, which is written of him: lutravit ut vulpes, roZimvit ut leo, mortuus ost ut oanis, he became pope like a fox, ruled like a lion, died like a dog.

012 It is this Boniface, who, in that same golden year, which he first lied about and brought about, when all the world ran to Rome, that the city was too straitened, and many people were oppressed, sat one day in his papal pomp, crown, and robe, and let himself be seen as a pope. The next day he sat in imperial pomp, crown, and robe. On the other day he sat in his imperial pomp, crown, and robe, and let himself be seen as an emperor, and showed two bare swords before him, and proclaimed: Leos äuo Zlaäii them, behold here are the two swords! For this is certainly what Christ meant when he answered the disciples about their two swords.

2) In the old editions: "gewegenesten".

3) "in" is missing from Erlanger.

(13) It is this Boniface who has gathered together the filth (Sext Decretal, I would say) of the previous popes, in order to raise the papal throne above God's word, worldly dominion, body, soul, and goods of all men on earth, where it might be possible; and he has left many other praiseworthy papal virtues behind him as an example to his descendants, about which they are very fierce halls. For it is an article of faith with them: What a pope at Rome does or does, that has been done by the holy Christian church and God himself. Cause, a pope cannot err.

14. From this and similar histories (oh, God would that an idle and learned historian would compile such examples of how often the popes have grabbed for the imperial and royal crowns) one sees and grasps that nevertheless the most holy fathers at Rome considered this Donation of Constantine, the most diabolical lie of all, for the most important article of the Christian faith, and always thought how they could get it on its feet, God granting that the other articles and all of Christendom would have it their way, if they could only become God and lords of the world through such manifest idolatry. And they have truly gone far, and further, than he meant who first told such lies.

015 For he hath nevertheless brought it about, that he hath stolen from the emperors and kings, and from all the world, the investiture, or the fief of the bishoprics, and also benefices unto himself, if he hath not founded them, nor given them; and hath shed innumerable blood thereat, and laid all plagues upon the emperors and kings. For it was the time of divine wrath, which through the pope wanted to punish the world in this way. Otherwise it would not be right, even today, for a man to take and give his own pleasure, which is not his. For emperors and kings have not given it to the pope, but to the churches, to maintain preachers' chairs and schools; which the pope has usurped, and under the name of the church has most shamefully killed, even to war and rage against the founders.

016 For he hath made emperors and kings, and all the world, to worship him, and to kiss his feet; and the emperor hath given him an oath.

the Count Palatine had to carry the tail of his mule, and such unheard-of deference much, which should be kept by the Christians for the right true God alone. And the right God, on the other hand, gives good and honor. This devil's head lets him do such honors and gives nothing, but robs, steals, takes, and seizes everything that everyone has, in body, soul, goods, honor, and power. Therefore also at Rome they hold all the world for geese and ducks. Especially we Germans, and laugh that they can so finely ape and fool us under the name of God, of whom they otherwise speak less than of a cleaner.

(17) Item, he has brought it about that he writes and boasts of the kingdom of England, hereditary lord and feudal lord. I have seen such a writing with my eyes, which the pious man (God forgive me) Peter Paul Vergerius brought out to the Roman king Ferdinand and other German princes to incite them against the king of England. And as a sign he took annually from the whole kingdom the penny of St. Peter (so it is called) from every head that carried an incredible sum of money. For the St. Peter's penny is with us a half a coin or a mark: that I have had it said to me with truth from Anglicans that the pope had nine tons of gold annually from Anglican lands. Some say more. Truly, the greeks may make Constantine's heirs at Rome fat.

018 Should we not be justly astonished here, and ask, Where then cometh St. Peter, the poor fisherman of Bethsaida, that he is hereditary king of England, with his popes after him? They did not buy it, that is certain. They did not fight for it with the sword, that is certain. Nor did they receive it as a gift from God or from men; that is certain. Although they write that King Adolphus laid such St. Peter's pence on his kingdom out of devotion. He that believeth not shall not be damned.

019 And how often hath he banished and deposed the emperors, whether he might have become emperor thereby? And where he has not been able to depose them by banishment, he has nevertheless caused such division and discord among the princes.

that they had to depose one and choose another of his own liking, so that he might establish himself as ruler over the sovereigns and emperors; and he has succeeded on several occasions and failed on several occasions, as the histories testify, but not without much bloodshed. For this Donatio Constantini first made them drunk like sweet wine, and then mad, foolish, furious, and insane, until they became emperors and gods over the whole world, unable to digest such poison.

020 For he hath made it come to pass, that whosoever hath the kingdom of Neapolis and Sicily, shall yearly present unto the most holy father a goodly white horse, with a silver bridle, and harness most beautifully groomed; which he receiveth for a fief of such kingdoms. However, it is said that those who give it require that it be a bad gift and not a feudal right. Every pope gathers such horses as many years as he lives, and has them led before him alone, when he wants to be resplendent, with a special, splendid splendor, as a sign that he has sunk his claws into such kingdoms, and where fortune would have it, even such kingdoms, by virtue of this Donatiou Constantiui, would like to capture and take, because he lacks seals and letters. As then Pope Leo Decimus, my first Caiphas, did, who installed his cousin at Neapolis as king; But those at Neapolis were unfortunately at that time also anti-Papal, but much more vehemently and sharply than Luther, and gave the new papal king such strong poison that his body became grass-green, and so hard that one could not pierce the body with a spear, as a sign that they could not believe, and perhaps did not want to believe, the article of the papal faith, of the Donation of Constantine, because of the great weakness of their conscience.

021 For by his wickedness he hath gotten much more money out of the countries than the emperors of old had. What the emperors took from the lands, they needed to cultivate the lands and keep the peace. This wicked man took it and squandered it, leaving kings and countries to themselves to cultivate and keep the peace. Daniel says of the end of Christ in the eighth chapter: "Volus prosperuditor in manu ejus, the shalke will succeed in all his wickedness. Otherwise it would not have been possible for God's wrath to punish the sin of the world in such a way that it would have succeeded.

022 First, he hath devised the pallia over the archbishops, of which immeasurable money hath fallen to the Roman robber. For Mainz alone must give twenty thousand florins to Schalke for the pallium. Some say that, with the expenses, it amounts to thirty thousand. Other bishoprics give less, up and down. Yes, what devil has given him the power to plunder the foreign monasteries in this way, and to sell his four hanseatic threads at such a high price? But it is all to make him Constantine's heir, and to bring the world under him.

023 Item, after that he devised the annals, with an impudent public lie, but under such pretence (as he boasts), that he would gather a treasure to take against the Turk; that he never had any right thought, as the work is proved in the day. But everything was directed so that he would first bring the goods of the world under him, then become their lord and god through their own money and goods, and be called Emperor Constantine's heir. As it was said long ago, that the end of Christ shall lay up the treasures of the earth. And Daniel saith, He shall divide the lands unto his Mahusites in vain: 1) For he hath gotten it all in vain, like a thief, and by all manner of lies and deceit.

024 Item, he also invented the indulgence for money's sake against the Turk. Which was just as serious as that he now wants to reform the Roman court and city, and hold a concilium; nevertheless, it has carried great unspeakable money, and all the world has been cheated with it, without him also having strengthened his divinity and Constantinity a little by it. Now, of such robberies, stealing, lying, and deceiving, I have written in the beginning, to the German nobility. Whoever wants to, may read it further, for it is not necessary to repeat everything here. But this I have told, as they have told it up to our time.

1) "Mahusite"-followers of his god Mausim (Dan. 11, 39.). From this we can see that Luther wanted the word Mausim to be spoken in three syllables.

that one might see how the papacy, founded on vain lies and idolatry, born and grown out of them, is a true, real devil's empire, not only to destroy the holy Christian Church (of which I will say more in the following writings, and paint you devil, if I can, with God's help, as you have painted me), but also the worldly empire, so that he might become a much greater Constantinus than the same great Constantinus ever was.

025 What doeth he in our days? Because he will not succeed in all things, though he has succeeded in all things, as Daniel saith [Cap. 8:24], yet he cannot rest nor celebrate, nor suffer offence. In former times the cardinals of Rome were under the pope, as canons under a bishop, and remained in the city. But that was too spiritual, and not imperial pomp. For the emperor of old sent into the countries Oousulss or? rü68iä68, thus invented by the pope 1,6Aato8 out of his cardinals, that he might resemble the imperial regiment in deed, yet not have the name Ooiwulum or ?rg,68iäuin, but be called legates, until he cunningly obtained the Donation Constantini, and mightily overcame.

Twenty-six: this is begun and accepted of all the world. The legates have brought to the countries letters of butter, seals, indulgences, liberty, graces, and such a fair as has almost sucked the countries dry.

27 After this he makes 8 votbo8, uato8 I should say, in countries, as the bishop of Salzburg, and now also Mainz; these are hereditary legates, or, as they stammer it, born legates, who sit to hold the bishoprics in the rat king of Rome, and yet are canons of the church at Rome, so that at last all bishoprics and cathedrals come to Rome. As he has eaten up all the rich monasteries and convents in French-speaking countries, especially in Rome, by means of his rats, cardinals, so that finally all the clerical goods in the whole of Christendom will come home to the pope's canons. In time he will certainly send a cardinal to Cologne, Trier, Bamberg, Würzburg, and what other excellent monasteries there are, and they will then also become Legatz natz, that is to say, the "cathedral" of the pope.

are rats, who help their rat king in Rome to take and devour the cathedrals. Just as the present ruler of Mainz has eaten up, drunk up, and sucked up his monasteries, especially Magdeburg, so that he may hold his Roman canonry in honor.

028 Item: What did Pope Clement Septimus, my third Caiphas, do? he had stolen all the money that Julius Secundus left behind him under his cousin Leo Decima, whose chamberlain he was; he is said to have known about the fifty tons of gold, as they say, and in addition he poisoned many cardinals whom he suspected of having great money. And when he became pope, he did such evil in Welsh land that [it] was unpleasant, and was again afflicted with poison the seventh time. For six times he overcame it; but so that all his teeth, 1) nails, and hair of the whole body came off, that he was to be regarded as a bad lump of flesh. For it is said that he was the highest, most skilful master of giving and driving out poison at that time on earth, without any one being so wicked at the end (as they say), a more wicked one coming upon him, was also dug up after his death by some, and nose, ears and privates cut off, found lying early in the morning before his grave, with the title: l'räuellio maximus, the greatest villain.

029 This Clement, while he was still master of Leonis, purposed to satisfy his avarice (which was impossible), and issued a bull, that the tenth penny should be taken from the ecclesiastics, the twentieth from the temporal, high, and rich, and the fiftieth from the common man, for a treasury against the Turk. O great earnestness was there against the Turk, that is, to make all the world clean. For there were men at that time that reckoned with him, and concluded: Where such an estimation should have stood three years, not a penny would have remained in German lands. But the ass began his song too high, and thought the Germans would not notice it. But it was cut off at the Diet of Augsburg, under Maximilian, 1518.

1) In the old editions: "zeen". Whether this is to be resolved by "teeth", as Walch has done, or by "toes" (with the Erlanger), we leave undecided.

030 But he did not cease, when he was pope; he devised another little thing, to exhaust the world's goods. Then came the bulla, which he called Mons fidei, in which he offered all kings to sell the interest of his own papal chamber, that he might raise a great sum of money against the Turk. The holy father was so earnest that he wanted to raise money against the Turk, that is, to raise money from the kings. But it would not do, for he could not, for his great mischievousness and wickedness, be fortunate enough to deliver the world from its money, although he was notorious for being a great whoremonger, his own sister's natural son, and yet the proverb says that whoremongers are blessed. They also say in Italia that he was never baptized in his life. Therefore he is most worthy of being pope at this time, since no pious man is to be pope or cardinal, but the most wicked boys on earth now belong to such ranks. As they themselves confess, that in Rome there is the basic soup of the most wicked boys on earth.

(31) In sum, there have always been enough learned, wise men, as the histories show, both in the secular and ecclesiastical classes, especially who have well judged the pope's mischievousness and tyranny, and have spoken and done against them. But the hour of the pope was not at hand, therefore they did not accomplish anything, but the saying of Daniel must be fulfilled, when he says [Cap. 8:24, 25], "The truth shall be put down in the streets (that is, publicly)." And again, "It shall succeed to the shalke, until the wrath be out." And Christ saith [Matt. 24:22.], "These days shall be cut short, or else none shall be saved." Such an hour will now be here, whether God wills it; but that they should not believe it, if they "felt" it so hard that their hearts fell into their shoes, and still deeper. For they try many strange plots and schemes, and yet nothing helps; they do not lack men, but the hour wants to overthrow this Troy.

32 Therefore, since all that has been under God has endured and resisted, the pope must be emperor, and through his god, the devil, bring this false Donatio Constantini into being. For he is Certainly the Most High, above emperors and kings and all temporal rulers (I am not talking now about how he became the final Christian in the church, soon, God wills it), also has greater goods than all emperors, greater honor, greater power, and everything that is high in the world. It is he, next to God, altogether. As they also pretend to him, that he is king of kings, lord of lords, and an earthly god, and more of the abominable names that are painted on the forehead of the red, insolent harlot, Revelation 17:5. But nevertheless he preaches nothing, does no apostolic nor episcopal office to comfort souls, is nevertheless Ksrvus servorum vsi, and is true when vsī here is called äns munäi. For he is the right and chief servant of the devil, and destroyeth all things, as Daniel saith, Nirabilitr omnig, vastabit, he shall destroy all things abominably.

(33) Now further, in the Donation of Constantine there is this beautiful, tender lie, which has subsequently been the cause of many other decrees and great books, namely, that the four patriarchs, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, are to be under the pope of Rome. Such a lie is also an article of the holy papal church, and we do not want to let the text be seen here, as the Donatio Constantini hits itself in the cheeks. For, count it by the fingers, it says: Constantine gave such a donation on the fourth day after his baptism in Rome; at which time Constantinople was not yet built, much less a patriarch might have existed there; likewise also in Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem there were still bad bishops, as now the parish priests are, and the patriarch's name was invented long after. It is also evident that these four bishops, together with all the other bishops in all Greece or in the east, have never been under the pope, and are not yet. And so also the work in him himself makes such lies mightily disgraceful.

034 And that is more, neither Cyprian nor Augustine, the most illustrious bishops, together with other bishops in Africa, were under the bishop of Rome; Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, in particular, is like the bishop Cornelio of Rome, and calls him brother. And the Christians at that time

The bishops were all called papa, as is found in St. Cyprian, and St. Jerome also calls St. Augustine in his letters, until the devil then took such a name for the end-Christ in Rome alone. Just as he has robbed all bishops and churches of their power, goods, and honor, and has snatched them from him. And St. Ambrose of Milan, along with many other bishops in the French lands, has not been under the pope. And as a sign of this, the same diocese of Milan still keeps the ecclesiastical laws, or the way of singing and reading masses, as St. Ambrose kept them, much differently than Gregory of Rome and the Roman church kept them afterwards.

35 And what may there be many words? St. Jerome, one of the four teachers, whom they made a cardinal even after his death, writes thus: that the Roman bishop is nothing more than the bishop of another city, but that all are equal, and says: Bi Quasritur autoritas, ma)or ost orbw urdo, which is said in German as much: And if the Romans held it differently, still the whole world must hold Christianity more than Rome. For the whole world held it at that time (as the truth is) that all bishops are equal. And further, the same man may say that at first there was no bishop at Alexandria, but the priests (which are now called preachers and chaplains) governed the churches in harmony and equally with one another. But afterwards, to prevent sectarianism, lest any one should seize the churches and divide the people, one was drawn out of the priests and called a bishop. For this reason he also writes about the epistle of St. Paul that priests and bishops are one thing, and proves it clearly from the text, as everyone can read for himself in the epistles of St. Paul, especially in Titum.

(36) Now Jerome lived about the same time, and after Constantine lived with ten emperors, as the histories testify, that he would have known well of such a donation by Constantine and the bishop of Rome, especially because he was a priest of the church at Rome, and the pope's scribe of Damascus, as he himself says. And it is a wonder that they do not still call such an arch-heretic today.

Burn the bishop of Rome, who speaks so dryly and freshly of the bishop of Rome, how he is equal to all other bishops and above none, so that he makes this Donation of Constantine such a shameful lie. And show how desperate, mendacious, shameful knaves and villains the following popes and papists have been, who not only invented such cursed lies (which would be a human folly), but also imposed them on all Christendom as an article of faith, thereby robbing and stealing all the world's goods, honor, and power; So that they also dare to kill, burn, and damn into the abyss of hell the people who do not worship such devil's filth for God. This is the devil himself with his mother.

37 What thinkest thou? If St. Jerome had lived to see such a time as this, when the Roman bishop would have exalted himself not only above all the bishops and ecclesiastics of Christendom, but also above the emperor and all the secular classes, as if he were God himself, oh, how he should have washed the pope! For if he will not let it be true that the Roman bishop is higher than any other bishop, how shall he let him be God and lord over all Christendom and over all the world? Yes, the pope ought to have let him. As he should have done in the days when the true bishops and fathers lived, as Cyprian, Martin, Hilarius, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and their like, who were not the Roman bishops.

038 For we read in the Ecclesiastica historia, that the pope Victor would have put all Christendom to the east, with all the bishops of Greece, under ban, because they kept not the paschal feast on the same day with him, and with the church of Rome; (so even in time the bishops of Rome took hold of the high authority of the churches. For this happened two hundred years after the birth of Christ, when the pagan emperors still reigned at Rome.) Then a priest of Lyons in France, called Irenaeus, who was also one of the oldest teachers, came to Rome and punished Victor for wanting to cause such distress and confusion in the church.

Christianity for the sake of Easter Day, and he also refused that the pope should desist from his injurious presumption.

039 Then, behold, this Irenaeus is not a bishop, neither is he a priest of Rome, but of another church in another country: nevertheless he punished the bishop of Rome, and turned to his foolish banishment and iniquity. If he had considered the pope to be the highest bishop by divine right, and emperor, to whom no one could say, "What are you doing? He would certainly have spared such majesty, and would not have interfered with his office against the papal authority. But since the time that such Irenaei and Hieronymi no longer existed, the devil has exalted his rat-king and hempen so high that he will hear no father or teacher, neither old nor new, nor concilium nor church, but wants to be above concilium and above everything, and one alone shall hear him. Neither does he want to hear emperor or imperial law, neither reason nor reality, but all rights shall be in the shrine of his heart, and shall spring forth, as he roars in his books, even shouting vehemently, as that all thrones and the highest judges shall be judged by him, and no one shall judge him, perhaps not even GOD himself. For how can God judge him, since he has all rights sitting in his heart's shrine, and cannot do wrong, even though he would like to, since everything he does flows from his heart's shrine, in which all rights must be, and all right must be, since it is the shrine of all right.

040 And this is yet more, that he also will be undirected from the holy scripture, which is the word of God (which is God himself); but here again he roareth in his book, that not the Roman throne hath power from the holy scripture, but the holy scripture from the Roman throne. That is, to exalt oneself above God and against God. God must disgrace you, you shameful, cursed liar and blasphemer! How insolently thou ledest on high! But thus it was written by the end of Christ through St. Paul, and thus it had to be fulfilled, for the plague and punishment of the unbelieving world, which always preferred to believe lies and did not accept the love of truth.

41 Now this is the sacred article of the papal faith, of the Donation of Constantine, that is, of the desperate, impudent lie; which I have set forth in the light, that all pious Christians may see how the desolate abomination of the papacy is based on vain lies, and that his church is the church of the devil. Whoever wishes to read further of this, may read the pope's law, especially in o. Eunota, item o. Solito, item c. kastorslis; then in the beginning, middle, and end of all and every decree. For in the beginning he always boasts that he is supreme in God's providence. In the middle, he judges and gives what and how he wants, as a god. In the end, he threatens the disobedient with God's wrath. So that all his writing, speaking, and doing says this much: "Behold, all of you, I alone am emperor, lord, and god; I cannot do wrong, but without me everyone is wrong. For the devil has poured these lies into him, when he became so full of them and so mad that he kicks and spits so horribly in his rights that his god, the devil, might even be afraid of them. But we have been his swine, and have eaten up all that the devil hath wrought in him above and below.

(42) But the most holy father and mother of all churches humbles himself, and calls himself Servus servorum Dei, after St. Gregory, who first used such a title, and never thought that it should be a hereditary title or Mtulu8 natus. Just as every Christian, the emperor also himself, should have, or rather fulfill, such a title. For Christ also called himself a servant of all the servants of God, and the least in the kingdom of heaven, according to which all Christians ought to wash one another's feet, and to be servants, and by humility to hold one another higher than themselves, as St. Paul teacheth everywhere, that one should precede another in reverence. This is called 8srvus 8orvorum Osi. And so Gregory also meant and held it.

043 But St. Pabstus puts on such sheep's clothing, and covers himself with such a title, that his wolfishness should not be noticed. For as he is a servant of the servants of God, his works prove that he wants to be of Everybody must have served him, even against and above God, or whoever does not do so must be eternally damned. It has never been heard that the pope has kissed the feet of an emperor, king, or prince, as he has his feet kissed by emperors, even though the emperors were Christians and God's servants. And even if they were sometimes wicked, and thus not servants of God, the pope has never been pious, and yet he has remained famous as a servant of God, and has nevertheless allowed himself to be kissed. Therefore, as he allows himself to be kissed, the holiest servant of all servants of God, so he should also kiss the feet of all servants of God, at least of his chamber servants, if he considers them to be Christians, or should not suffer his feet to be kissed by anyone, since he wants to be the holiest among Christians.

(44) Such things, and the like of many other articles of the holy papal church, would be necessary to be acted upon in a free Christian council, if we were worthy in the sight of God, and if they deserved that God should give them this grace, that they might know themselves, and have to atone for and amend such unspeakable wickedness: then they would, as I do, judge of themselves, that all of them, pope, cardinals, bishops, etc., should be hanged on the gallows, drowned, beheaded, and burned, as the arch-thieves, robbers, seducers, murderers, and the beginners of all wickedness, should be hanged on the gallows, drowned, beheaded, and burned, as the arch-thieves, robbers, seducers, traitors, murderers, bloodhounds, and the beginners, mediators, and finishers of all wickedness. For I too, alas, have been among the blasphemous multitude of the papal church (I must confess, as St. Paul does, and do it cheerfully and gladly), helping to blaspheme and profane the holy blood of Christ and his power, by our own holiness and wisdom. But I knew it no better, and thought it was right and well done; but they know it now, and yet continue in this way, and defend it with all their power and persecution.

(45) Therefore they will not be worthy of the merciful punishment of being hanged, drowned, beheaded, burned; which would be to be wished for them, and I would well wish for them, if God's wrath would thereby be turned away or relieved, which otherwise they must bear eternally in hell. For St. Paul says [2 Thess. 2, 8]: that our Lord Christ himself will judge the end-Chris; first of all, he will kill with the Spirit of his

He will destroy it by his word and by his bright future. Therefore neither church nor council, neither emperor nor man's power, will punish the papacy and pay it according to its merits. They have it too high, too low, too thick, too coarse, too long, too far overpowering, with all mischievousness, superstition, lies, and blasphemies, that it cannot reach human punishment and wrath, but their sentence is [Matt. 25:41.], "Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." For the angels of the devil are called not only the spirits or other devils, but also the popes, bishops, and cardinals, as the Revelation of John testifies; just as again the angels of Christ are not only the heavenly spirits, but also the pious, holy bishops, pastors, and preachers on earth in Christendom, as he himself says that St. John the Baptist is his angel.

046 But it is a good thing how it should be with such men, that they should not believe it, but also laugh at it, and mock it, as they did before the flood, and afterward Lot the oath. How ridiculous it was to them that Sodoma should perish! But soon after the laughter became a perpetual howling, and they must sing the fool's song: ^on puta886m, I would not have meant! So now the papists also laugh when they hear God's wrath, of which they know themselves guilty in their conscience, convinced by their own shameful, blasphemous, damned life. But they will also then have to sing with weeping and gnashing of teeth: ^on puta886m. But alas, too slow. The world wants it so, no Enoch, no Noah, no Abraham/ no David, no Elijah, 1) no prophet, no Christ, no apostle helps. So go on; it is valid whom the game repents of.

047 Forasmuch then as the papal abomination shall not receive its punishment here on earth, but is reserved unto Christ himself at the last judgment, even as the devils are all kept in chains of darkness unto the same judgment, as St Peter saith, We must let it go as it goes, and let it go as it goes; and

1) The words: "no Elijah" are missing in the Erlanger, but are in the Wittenberger and in the Jenaer.

And they shall be brought to the same judgment, since there is no hearing there, and no crying of their own conscience against them. But that we nevertheless always continue, hard against hard, and uncover the abomination's butt and shame (as the prophets use to speak), so that all the world, and they themselves, must see their own shame, so that we may serve God at least in the part where he kills his adversary by the spirit (or breath) of his mouth. For such breath and the spirit of his mouth proceedeth therefore mightily, and it is needful for the holy church to know such abomination, that she may beware thereof, and pray against it, amen.

1241. D. Martin Luther's writing, "The Lying of St. Chrysostom, to the Fathers of the Concilium at Mantua." Before May 20, 1537.

The first edition of this writing appeared under the title: "The Lie of S. Johanne Chrysostomo, to the Holy Prayers in the supposed Concilio of Mantua, by D. Marti. Marti. Luther. Wittenberg. M.D.XXXVII." At the end: "Printed at Wittenberg by Hans Lufft. M.D.XXXVII. Thereafter in the collections: in the Wittenberg (1553), vol. IV, p. 438; in the Jena (1568), vol. VI, p. 499d; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 1103; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 187; in the Erlanger (1st), vol. 25, p. 202, and in the second edition, vol. 25, p. 233. The closer determination of the time results from the words of the inscription, "now on future Pentecosts." - The legend itself is found in "Der Heiligen Leben," Nuremberg, 1488, col. 326; in the Strassburg edition of 1517, fol. 158, and from a manuscript in des Vulpus "Curiosities," vol. III, p. 161.

To the holy and ecclesiastical lords, Pope Paul the Third, the cardinals, archbishops, along with other prelates of the church (to speak with Laube), who now think and are suspected of coming to the Concilium at Mantua on future Pentecost, Martinus Luther, unworthy preacher and doctor 2c.

1st My friendly greeting beforehand! Let not your holiness and clergy's ears or noses be surprised that I, a damned, accused, unclean, stinking heretic, should venture to come before your holy purity with such a foul, stinking writing of mine. For your holiness know that St. Paul saith, All things are clean unto the pure: as the brightness of the sun is not hurtful to uncleanness. And even if my stinking uncleanness were so great beyond measure that your pure holiness could not suffer it, but had to hold its nostrils against it, think that uaocossitas IsAsui üou llabat, and in German: Noth breaks iron 2c. How else one must suffer an accidental stink.

(2) For the bulla also came before me, wherein you, through your most holy head, the pope, have proclaimed a council to Mantua, truly (as no one else can easily think) with great earnestness and zeal, to counsel and help the poor consciences, as you have always done until now. And almost nineteen years ago I appealed from Pabst Leonis, iukalióis uiiauioriaa, freventish, devilish ban and sentence to a common Concilium, never deserted such appeal, but always and always, as the right principal, adhered to it, and was and still am willing to follow it. For this reason, I have had to accept such a written Concilii, out of necessity, as is the case today. I had also resolved to appear personally and bodily myself, and to make you bonum vultum, as I promised orally to Petro Paulo Vergerio, Papal Holiness Oratori, here in Wittenberg; notwithstanding that your God is the consuming fire by which you are wont to overcome the heretics.

(3) But if I have fallen into great weakness this year, that it is not possible for me to make such a journey to the council bodily, nor have I the money and property of fortune, that I might order my handsome, needy procurator or legation. For of course there will be no one among you who would and could conduct my cause and word before your terrible, fiery God as well as I do, so I must come as I can; if it is not on foot, horse or chariot, then it will be on paper and ink. But I have been able to send this John Chrysostom (whom you no doubt know well) to your holiness for a preface and credence, because he is called Chrysostom, that is, the Golden Mouth; for your holiness likes to hear beautiful, sweet, golden words and prefaces.

Besides this you 1) may also taste and smell what great things I have to do against the popes, cardinals, bishops, and other prelates of the church in the Concilio.

004 For such unswerving, desperate lies and idolatry have they not only taught, but also confirmed with grace and indulgence, and filled all the world therewith; yet now, praise God, all the world grasps, and ye yourselves also well understand and know that such are true lying, conceited, devilish lies, and vain seducing idolatry. Not only have they torn and devoured the sheep of Christ like wolves, but like the apostles and prophets of the infernal Satan they have destroyed and laid waste the holy church, made of it an abominable, infernal pit of murder, for which they have taken, robbed and stolen, as the most desperate evil-doers, the goods of all the world, in which they, and you also now, are resplendent and triumphant, as I will further indicate hereafter. For after this my preaching I will come, I will show God, and the golden mouth by the silver mouth, and what your golden and silver men have preached and earned; for it is not for nothing that the great Saint Chrysostom is called by such poets. Herewith be commanded to your dear God.

of St. Johanne Ehrhsostomo.

001 There was a pope at Rome, which rode<sup>a</sup> one day, and many rode with him. Now the pope had a tit that he often joined 2) and said his prayers; but he did so, 3) and when he was at the joining, he heard a voice cry out piteously. Then thought <sup>he</sup> him, O woe, what is this?

What is the lamentation of the voice? and he rode on for bass, and there it cried 3) lamentation. Then thought he unto him, I must know what it is; and he turned back from the voice which he heard, until he was nigh unto it: and seeing nothing, he said against himself, How is it that I hear, and see nothing? That seemeth strange unto me: and he said, I command thee by GLt, that thou tell me what thou art. Then said the voice most pitiful: I am a poor soul, O woe is me! for I am a poor soul.

(c) Purgatory You must believe this of the devil will cheat you.

002 And when the pope heard it, he wept greatly, and said, Tell me, poor soul, if I may not help thee? And the soul said, Nay: and he said, I am heartily sorry for this. Now God hath given me much power, that I may bind<sup>d</sup> and loose sinners: tell me, therefore, if any man will help thee? Then said the soul, There is a thing made known unto me this day, wherein I have hope: for there is a blessed man in Rome, which hath a good wife, which is with child this day, which shall be blessed, and shall be called John, and shall be a priest; and when the priest shall have said his sixteenth mass, then shall I poor soul be done from my torment. And told him by what lane the man and the woman sat, and what their names were. And with that the priest departed from her: and the soul cried out as before.

(d) bind) Also in hell, and four weeks under hell.

003 After this the priest came to the servants, and durst not ask him where he was. Then he rode sadly again to Rome, and sent for the same man and for his wives, and received them amicably, and said to the women: Wife, thou must be blessed: it is told me of thee, that thou hast conceived a child this day, and that it shall be called John, and that the child shall be holy. Then said the woman, I cannot muck this up: let God's will be done for me. Then said the priest, I pray thee both, when the child is born, that ye may know me; and I will baptize him, and will submit myself to the child, and will be his father for ever<sup>e</sup>. They both thanked him, and he gave them his blessing, and they departed from him. And when the child was born, they delivered it to the priest, and he was very glad, and commanded his captain to ride with him to the baptism; and they baptized him, and called his name John, and took the nurse and the child.

to his court, and often visited the child. And when he was seven years old, he was sent to school, and he learned very badly, and the others often mocked him; and he was very much ashamed of himself, and went every day into a church before the image of our Lady, and earnestly besought her to help him that he might learn well.

e) Father) The mother may have been beautiful.

<sup>4f)</sup> One day St. John prayed before the image with devotion, that he might learn well, when Our Lady called unto him, and said, Kiss me at my mouth, and thou shalt learn all arts, and be taught better than any man on earth. Then he was very much afraid, and could not do it. But our Lady said, "Go safely to me with my escort. Then he went and kissed Our Lady at her mouth, and sucked therefrom all the heavenly arts, so that he interceded of God, and of all things, and spoke all things well, as no teacher can. And when he was gone out of the church, and came into the synagogue, and would have learned, he could do more than all the rest together. Then they all laughed, and said: How is it that thou art so well instructed, and that they could not put hard knocks into thee, and now thou canst do more than we all? Then they looked on him, and saw that he had a golden rice about his mouth, and that the gold shone as a bright star of right brightness. Then they asked him what had happened to him, and from whence had come the golden ring that was about his mouth? Then he told them what had happened to him. And they learned of him forsooth; for there was none that knew his art: and they called him John forsooth with the golden mouth, and said: Thou art called thus, because thou speakest golden words, which proceed out of thy mouth. So while he lived he wore the <sup>9</sup>ring, and his name remained so.

f) which wants to become it, there the lie goes pastidlich therefore.

(g) bore) But when he kissed the emperor's daughter afterwards, he was bent.

5th Now the pope was very fond of St. John, and where a benefice<sup>h)</sup> was vacant, he ordered it to be conferred on him. Then he became very rich, and lived virtuously and holy. Then the pope ordained him priest by the will of the poor soul, so that it might be comforted.) And when he was sixteen years old, they ordained him priest, and the pope commanded him to prepare for the first mass, saying, "You shall not wait any longer,") for he was sorry for the poor soul. Then St. John sang the first mass with great devotion, and thought to him during the mass: Lord, I am still too young, and it is very contrary to God, that I should be a priest now, and deal with God; and he said, Lord, I am sorry that they have consecrated me to the priesthood. For I am not worthy that I should deal with thee with my childish hands,

I shall always be sorry. And he said: I know well that temporal goods hurt the soul, <sup>k)</sup> therefore I will be poor through God. What is the good that is against God to me? As soon as we have eaten, I will go into the woods, and I will be there all the days of my life. And as he sang the mass, he thought unto him, Alas, if the mass were ended, and the mass seemed long to him. And when the mass was ended, they went with joy unto the table, and received the young priest beautifully, and had all that they should have.

h) See, were there already benefices at that time, when there was no pope?

i) Ei nun, taunt thee GOOD once more, thou sorrowful devil, with thy pabst.

k) harms! The pope wouldn't believe it if he knew.

006 And when they had eaten, Saint John did as he thought, and stole away from them secretly, and put on evil apparel, that he should not be known; and he took bread with him, and went into the wood, where he abode many a day, that he might have a good 2) rest. And when the pope was in, and the other lords that they had lost him, they were very sorry, and sought him everywhere, and wondered greatly where he was come. Then Saint John walked a long time in the forest, and asked God to be with him with his graces, and to provide for him. Then he saw a little spring, and went by the water, and was very glad, and came to a hollow stone, and under the stone the water went; and he thought unto it, Here shall thy dwelling be. And the little water was very merry. And he took grass and bark, and covered his cell therewith, and made a door <sup>m)</sup>thereon for the beasts. And when he had eaten the bread, he sought the herb and the root, and fed himself therewith, and ate also the leaves and the grass, and looked up to God often, and lived very poorly, until he found out what root was good. He served God day and night with prayer, fasting, vigilance, and many other good practices.

Hag, in the summer, with many beautiful maidens, by pleasure, and wanted to look at the flowers and the green clover. And there came a great wind among all the maidens, and they were sore afraid: and the wind was so great, that it took the emperor's daughter, and carried her up from among the maidens into the air, that they knew not whither she was gone. <sup>o)</sup> Then they were very sorry, and said: What shall we answer the emperor? And when they were come home, the emperor asked them, Where is his daughter? And they said unto him, A wind-breed had led her away. And he was very sorry.

(n) Emperor) he had no name, as also the pope above.

o) Ever that must be true, who could conceive it?

008 Then the wind made the damsel lie down by the hollow stone, by the cell of St. John, that she should never be hurt. Then she stood before the stone well dressed, with a crown and a robe, and knew not where to go, and looked round about to see if any man saw her. Then she saw St. John's cell, and she looked in; and she saw him lying on the ground at his prayer, as he often did. Then she was glad, and cried with a loud voice, saying, Lord, let me in by God. And St. John was afraid, and rose up, and looked round about. And she called unto him, and besought him diligently that he would let her in: and he held his peace. And she looked in, and besought him the third time to let her in, and said: I see that thou art a Christian, therefore thou shalt help me. If I were to lose my life here, it would be your fault, and if the beasts devour me, I would complain about you on the last day, and you would have to repent before God on the last day.

009 And when the damsel had cried a long while, he went unto the door, and when he saw her, he opened unto her, and asked her who she was, and how she was dark. And she said, It is God's will; and tell thee no more. Then thought he unto him, If she lose her life here, I am guilty of it before God, and let her go into the cell, and made a stroke <sup>p)</sup> in the cell with his staff, and said unto her, If thou be in that part, I will be in the other part, and come not over the circle unto me, and pray with diligence. Then said she: I will gladly do so. And she slept very little, and had no chamber. And when the day was come, she thought unto her, What shall I eat to-day? Now my dear host hath nothing to give me; I must suffer grief here. Then St. John arose and prayed with great devotion. <sup>q)</sup> Then the dear maiden also arose, and learned his good custom. Then said he, We shall go with one another for meat. So they did. But their food was nothing but cabbage, which they ate many a day for hunger, with great humility, praying and watching, and serving our Lord with great diligence. The enemy envied the exercises, and bore them both hatred, and rebuked them, and gave them evil counsel, and caused St. John to go over the circle to the virgins, into their half part, and embraced them sweetly, and won great love for her, and made the virgin fall into great sin by his will. After this they both felt great remorse for their sin, and were sorry that they had sinned against God. St. John said against himself, "All the good I have ever done through God is now lost. Then said the virgin, Alas, I have lost my honour, O Lord, that I have ever committed sin, and have offended God my Lord with it, I am sorry with all my heart. <sup>s)</sup>

010 One day after, St. John thought unto him, If the woman were longer with me, I would sin more with her: and he brought her up to a high stone, and cast her down, and went back into his cell, saying, Alas, I wicked man! Now have I done murder to the good women. Now she would never have thought of sin, if I had not brought it on her, and now I have taken her life. The unfaithfulness and the sin God will avenge on me forever. And he went out of the forest, and thought to himself that he would never serve God, that all would be lost, and said, O Lord God, thou hast forgotten me. But he gained a hope in God, and thought: I will confess. And he came to the pope to Rome, who was his god <sup>t)</sup>, and said unto him, Dear father, I am a great sinner; and he confessed all his sins with great contrition. Then the pope knew him not, and said unto him angrily, Get thee out of mine sight, for thou hast done evil to women, and it is all thine own fault. And he was sorry, and thought unto him, I will not despair of God. And he went again into the forest into his cell, and repented him, and thought unto him, God's mercy is greater than my sin. And he said, "Lord, receive repentance from me graciously. For I will

I will walk on my hands and feet until I have obtained thy mercy, <sup>u)</sup> and when I have atoned for my sin, let me be inward from thy bounty. And he crawled on all fours, as a beast in the forest, and when he would rest, he crawled into his cell, and crawled many a year after the food of his body, so that he never arose; and his garments almost rotted away from him, and became rough all over his body, that no man could know him.

(t) Dod) his pathe.

u) Fie your times on. 2)

011 And when he had been fifteen years in the forest, the empress had gotten a child, whom the wind had given a daughter: and when it was desired to baptize the same child, the emperor sent for the pope, and for many bishops: and when the pope, and the bishops, and a great company, were come to baptize the child, the pope took the child out of his hand, and the child said, I will not be baptized of thee. Then said the priest, Declare unto me thy will, whether I baptize thee? And the child said, I will not be baptized of thee. And the priest was sore afraid, and said, Hear, all ye people; for the child hath promised himself. What mean these things? And said unto the third time, Child, wilt thou receive baptism of me? And he said, I will not be baptized of thee: I will be baptized of St. John the Holy; God will send him forth out of his misery. Then the priest gave the child back to the nurse, and came home again to the women, and asked, "Who is St. John who is to baptize the child? No one knew anything about it.

012 Then the emperor commanded the huntsmen to ride into the forest, that they might catch him venison for the christening, and for the court. And when the huntsman had gone about a mile, he heard the hounds almost barking, and rode unto them, and saw a hideous beast before them, which he knew not. Then thought he unto him, Now art thou so hideous in form, that I may not punish thee, thou mayest easily tear me; I will go home before I am empty. Then thought he unto him, If I come home to my lord empty, he will be very wroth: and he took God for a helper, and he found the beast alone: it lay still before him, and he cast his mantle over him, and bound all his fours together, and was very glad when the beast was thus tamed; and he took his girdle, and bound him behind on the horse, and led him to his lord into the castle.

1) zuhand - asbald.

2) On this idiom, compare St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 2397 8. v. "mal an."

013 And many people came, and desired to see the strange and dreadful beast; and it crawled under the bench. And the emperor's nurse came with the little child, and said, Show me the beast. And there were also many knights and women to see it. Then one came with a rod, and thrust it before the bench, and it ran down again. Then he thrust it down, and it ran down again. Then he pushed it down a third time, and it stopped. Then said the newborn babe, John, my lord, I am to receive baptism of thee. Then said he, If it be the will of God, and if thy words be true, speak it once more. And the child said, My lord, what wilt thou do? 3) I will be baptized of thee.

014 Then called St. John our Lord with devotion, and said, Lord, shew me out of the child's mouth, whether I have repented of my sin? Then said the child, John, thou shalt be glad, for God hath forgiven thee thy sin. Therefore arise, and baptize me in the name of God. And he arose from the earth, and the herb and the moss 4) that had grown in his body fell from him, and his body became as beautiful as that of a young child. Then they brought him garments, which St. John put on him. Then the pope and all the lords received him. And baptized the child with great devotion. Then the priest asked him to sit down with him. Then said St. John, Father, knowest thou me not? Then said the priest, No. Then said St. John, I am thy dodger, *whom thou baptizedst, and didst make me go to school, and gavest me many benefices, and didst ordain me to the priesthood very young; and when I sang my first mass, then thought I to myself, it were not fair that I should deal with God in my childish hands. And when I had sung the mass, and eaten, I went into the forest, where I suffered many mischiefs. And I told him all things that had befallen him, and how he had fared with the virgins, when he had confessed unto him.

015 When the emperor heard it, his heart was heavy, and he thought, It may have been my daughter: and he said, If any man will direct me to the stone where the woman lost her life, that we may find her bones, and commit them to the ground. Then said St. John:

3) "betten" == to wait, to forgive.

4) In the Erlanger: "Müelß"; in the Wittenberger and in the Jenaer: "myess".

If the hunter could come to the place where he found me, I would certainly show him the stone. Then said the hunter, Yea, well. Then they rode together into the forest, and St. John rode first to the stone; and there they all saw with their eyes the woman alive and well. Then said he unto her, Why sittest thou here alone in the stone? And she said, Know ye me not? And he said, Nay; and she said: I am the woman that came to thy cell, and whom thou didst cast down from the stone. Then said he, Who helped thee that thou wast yet alive? And she said: Then God of his goodness kept me safe, that no harm came to me. And the woman was so beautiful when she was before, and her garments also. And he marvelled greatly at this, and bade her go with him, and brought her to her father and to her mother, to whom she was well known: and they received her joyfully, and thanked God that they had found their daughter.

016 And the emperor asked the daughter, saying, How is she alive? And she said, There is no thing impossible for God to do. Neither wind, nor rain, nor snow, nor heat, nor frost, nor thirst, neither did I hunger. I will tell you no more. After this the pope rode home again, and said to him, "Dear Dodt, I will send word to your father and mother that you are well. And he sent his servant to them: I tell you good news that your son John is well. And they were glad, and went unto him, and received him with great joy. After this the pope said to him, "My dear Dodt, how many masses have you said? Then said he, Only one. Then said the priest, O woe to that poor soul, which hath so long suffered great chastisement! Then said he, Father, what meanest thou by this speech? Then said the priest unto him, how piteously he heard the soul crying in the wood, and how it had said, A woman is with child this day, and her name shall be John; and when the child shall have sixteen masses, then shall I poor soul be consumed with torment. I am comforted, dear Dodt, that God has made it known to me. Therefore I called you immediately to the priesthood, that the poor soul might be helped. Therefore, come to her aid. Then said he, Father, I will do what thou wilt.

017 And he said, Thou shalt say mass every day, until they be sixteen: and the soul shall be saved. This he did earnestly for the soul. And she was delivered from all her torment. Then the pope made him a bishop and sent him to his diocese. There he was humble, and served God diligently, and preached such sweet words, that he was called John, with

The mouth of gold. After this he was driven out of his bishopric, and came into a wild wilderness; and there he wrote much of God, and when the inks ran out of his mouth, he wrote with letters of gold. Therefore he was called John with the golden mouth. And when God would take him out of this world, he became infirm and died blessedly. y) Now we pray the dear saint that he may grant us eternal life, amen.

y) And praise God! that the lies have an end here. One lie after another is a lie. But one has to believe it.

End of the Lying St. John Chrysostom.

D. Martinus Luther.

001 There are two kinds of lies in the world, though St. Augustine makes three: officio8uin, soLosum, poruieiosum. Some lie jestingly, to make people merry, and do it so grossly that it should be noticed and laughed at. These liars (shall mau call them so cruel) do not desire that men should be deceived or harmed, but their final opinion is shame and jest. The others are real liars, who lie in earnest, and knowingly want to deceive and harm people. Let there be no one (who has come to his years) who has not experienced such liars and known their harm, especially those who live in high places and offices. For they also, where it burns them, cry out and complain how the world is false and full of unfaithfulness, that even (as the prophet Micah says) married people, parents and children, housekeepers and servants, are unfaithful and false to one another. What then shall we think of neighbors and strangers?

002 Now such a lie is not to be so highly lamented, because it only does bodily harm, and the harm at last reveals and exposes the lies. But where it enters into spiritual matters, there it would be worth complaining about who might come to it. There are two kinds of lies: one is a human lie, which lies for the sake of temporal good; the other is a devilish lie, which lies in spiritual matters. For the latter remains covered and unrecognized (without God's word enlightening the hearts) until it is revealed to the eternal and unsurpassable God.

And there is no more consolation nor help for ever.

3 Now the holy papacy or papal church is full of all human lies, as they themselves confess at Rome, and is also publicly in the open, that [it] no one can deny. But this would not be the pity yet; but this is the lie that does the harm, that such a church and holy papacy is founded and established on devilish lies, which no one knows, nor notices its harm, until it brings all the world into eternal hellish fire, since there is no salvation nor return, and no one can atone for the harm, but that the pope, with his indulgences, purgatory, and holy service, has so shamefully deceived, lied to, and cheated the world out of its goods and money; this could be overcome, because money and goods are restored by God every day; but that he has deceived souls by such lies, and drawn them away from Christ to his and their own works, this is the devil, diabolical lies, and hellish fire with eternal death.

(4) One of these lies is the lie of John Chrysostom, which was invented by a desperate devil's head to pretend to the pope and to confirm his devil's church (as well as many others), and everything in it was directed so that the masses and purgatory (on which the papacy stands) would be kept high, and all goods would be given to them; as has happened and is happening. And although they themselves now know and perceive that they are such shameful lies, they not only do not want to mend their ways at all, but knowingly defend the lies they have recognized, force people by force to believe and worship such obvious lies, and kill, chase away, and burn them. Besides, with such lies they also do the harm that sensible people, when they notice such obvious lies, begin to doubt even the right main articles of the true Christian faith, and think: One is like the other; if this is a lie, then that is also not true. And become epicurei. Such miserable, unspeakable harm is done by the diabolical, accursed, lying papacy in the church with such wretched liars. But God knows how to preserve His own.

005 Though now they laugh at such lies, and will not believe them. But good be to you, dear-Young people, you who now have the light, and have not been under the empire of the pope's lies, as I and my kind have been. If any man, twenty years ago, should have thought of this lying Chrysostom, that some part of it was a lie, he should have been burned to ashes, without all mercy. Neither emperor, king, prince, doctor, art, nor force could have helped. So sternly did the scoundrels, preaching monks, Ingui8itor68 baiei-etieae pravitati8 deal with the matter; so earnestly did we have to believe the lies, and fear and worship their father, the devil, and celebrate his scoundrels and platitudes. Laugh now, and mock with confidence at these lies that are revealed, for ye do right and well in them; be glad also that ye now know them. But also be thankful for the grace of God, and pray that you may not again fall into temptation and be deceived.

006 For of this ye must be sure, that when there is a council, nothing shall be done therein, but that such lies shall be confirmed in all letters, and all they condemned to death and hell that will not believe them. For the holy fathers do not want to be deceived; you can be sure of that. And how should they revoke or change such little lies, which have a little appearance, when they boast in all their writings of the greatest, greatest, most impudent lie, which is so palpable without any appearance at all, and is an impudent lie even in their own conscience, and they insist on it to the whole world, namely, that the pope at Rome is the bishop over the whole Christian church in the whole world. Which they well know is a lie, never has been, never will be, nor ever can be. And such a name is not due to any man, but only to the one man, who is called Jesus Christ.

007 Now not only do they lie against their conscience, but they also falsely bring up the scripture, Matt. 16:18, "Thou art Peter," 2c. This is the greatest deception that has come upon the earth, and should and must be the last time before the last day. Of which I will speak further in writing (if God gives me time and strength) with the holy fathers at Mantua, where they also did not lie about the Concilium. For the plate

The kingdom of heaven is made of lies and built on lies; it must do nothing but lie with words and works and all its strength. Christ our Lord, the blessed truth, keep us in his faith and knowledge, amen.

1242. D. Martin Luther's preface to the writing: "Ein alt christlich Concilium zu Gangra in Paphlagonia, vor 1200 Jahren gehalten", published by Joh. Kymeus in German in 1537.

The text to which Luther wrote this preface is entitled: "An Old Christian Concilium, held for twelve hundred years at Gangra in Paphlagonia, against the high holiness of the monks and resisters. Item an old miraculous history and recollection of those who wanted to revenge Christ on the Jews and the Gentiles. And of many other things, most recently recorded. By M. Johannem Kymeum, pastor of Homberg in Hesse, explained and interpreted. With a preface by D. Mart. Lutheri." At the end: "Printed at Wittenberg by Joseph Klug. M.D.XXXVII." 9z sheets in quarto. In the editions: in the Wittenberger I 1559), vol.XII, p.364; in the Jenaer (1568), vol. VI, p. 495; in the Altenburger, vol. VI, p. 1098; in the Leipziger, vol. XXI, p. 174; and in the Erlanger, vol. 65, p. 56.

Preface by D. Mart. Luther.

Because I must now be a prefatory writer, I make this preface to this fine booklet: that I almost like to see it, and it is also useful and helpful to our Gospel, and as harmful and unpleasant to the shameful papacy, as a right Concilium, that one may draw forth the right old Concilia, and the right Fathers' Scriptures. For this Gangrense Concilium is the best of all. Although it was not a general, but rather a small, general council, it is nevertheless better in every respect than all the councils that the pope has ever held. For here you see how these right-minded bishops take hold of the right things. But in the pope's Concilii, the most necessary trade is which cardinal shall be above the other, which bishop shall be the highest, and of the jugglery without number and measure.

(2) Yes, if these holy bishops should wish to act or conclude such things in the Pope's Concilii as they act in this Concilio of theirs, when devils, how thin ashes they should become through the fire! But praise be to God, Honour and thanks, who by such and their like holy bishops, so long before, hath condemned the shameful pope, with his false holiness, in food, clothing, unchastity, 2c. Therein it is seen how the papacy has embraced almost all the heresies that have raged against Christ, and has gathered a basic soup from them to deceive all the world, since they alone have deceived some parts of countries.

(3) But I praise the most holy papists, that they can rage so firmly and constantly against the Spirit of God, when such testimonies of the true churches and fathers are led, that they do not ask anything about them, but leave their strong argument against it: the pope is above all churches, and cannot err, and also above all holy Christendom in the whole world. And lest anything should be equal to him, but should also pass over God, he roars in his decrees, c. Ouneta, that is, All Christendom in the Welt knows that the holy Scriptures have their authority or power from the Roman See. Yea, yea, saith Luther, all Christendom in the world know the hellish fire upon thy head, chair, and idol, the devil. This little holy council at Gangra doth abundantly testify. And I would, if I had time, bring more of the kind to light. For what shall I say now of the secular estate, which is the pope's footstool and stableboy, and the pope's mules must wipe the back of their mouths? as it is in the day.

(4) This Concilium Gangrae is also referred to several times in the sacred ecclesiastical law, as are several other fine sayings of the fathers, but in such a way that the pope's mouth always retains the supreme power. For the most holy father does not want to rule according to such fine conciliarities and sayings, but he decrees and commands that the laws and letters of the Roman bishops should be kept as well as the holy Scriptures, all conciliarities, and all sayings of the fathers. And if this is not done, no one can be saved, even if three of them die for us. For the pope is the right saviour of all bet; Christ is nothing, except the cap. Cuncta and his like. Of this once more. May Christ, our dear Lord, accomplish the work he has begun, amen.

1243 D. Martin Luther's Preface and Postscript to Several Letters of John Hus, Written from the Prison at Costnitz to the Bohemians Anno 1415. Beginning of 1537.

A single print of this writing appeared under the title: "Etliche Briewe Johannis Huß des Heiligen Merterers, aus dem gefengnis zu Costenz, An die Behemen geschriben. With a preface by Doct. Mart. Luther." At the end: "Printed at Wittenberg by Joseph klug. Anno. M. D. LXLVij." 5<sup>a</sup> quarto sheets. In the editions: in the Wittenberg (1559), vol. XII, p. 277; in the Jena (1566), vol. VI, p. 496; in the Altenburg, vol. VI, p. 1099; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 175; and in the Erlangen, vol. 65, p. 59. - It should also be noted that in the Jena and Altenburg editions only Luther's preface and epilogue are printed, with the omission of everything in between. In the Wittenberg and Erlangen editions, Hussens's letters are given in a different translation than in the Leipzig edition and Walch. In the latter two editions, a "description of the last action taken with Hus" is inserted after Hussens's letters. - In the superscription of the editions the year 1416 is wrong. Hus was burned on July 6, 1415.

These letters of M. I have had them written in Latin from the Bohemian language so that I might have them printed, especially in this year, when the Concilium has been announced by our dear Lord, Emperor Carol; not so nearly that I aroused hostility and enmity to the Costenzer Concilio (which I otherwise gladly did, and from now on am ready to do with all my heart's desire, for the sake of his shameful, damned deed, also out of my and the whole holy church's need and right), but that I admonished, who should let themselves be reproached, if God wanted the said Concilium to proceed, to beware and beware of the example of the Costenzer Concilii, in which the truth was disputed and contested with great violence, and afterwards for a very long time. But now she has the victory, and carries the head upward, and leads the same Rottenconcilium to the spectacle publicly by herself, and has taken from it its power and tyranny with all joy.

It was the most important thing in the same Council, especially among the cardinals and the high estates, that they should stop the division of the church, and meanwhile let the things of faith be commanded to the desperate and shameful people, whom we call the monks.

and are called Sophists. From them, as the elders, went forth the wickedness of Babylon, as the prophet saith, and there followed in Germany and Bohemia lamentation, war, battle, bloodshed, and such hatred as can never be quenched.

Nevertheless, the papacy, then supplemented by the schism, did not celebrate, and filled all the churches in the whole world with mighty lies, indulgences, purchase fairs, and all kinds of fairs of good works, which priests and monks offered and had for sale. This was the fruit of the Most Holy Council.

Therefore, it will certainly not do to order such devil-heads to do the things of faith, but the kings, princes, and bishops must see to it themselves, lest the same or worse result from this Council. God has indeed demonstrated at the Costenzer Concilio how he resists the trustworthy, and scatters all those who are of a trustworthy mind, and asks no one how great he is and who he is.

This is the reason why I let these letters go out, namely this admonition: Whoever does not want to be burned so many times, let him always go to the devil, he corrupts without my fault. Our dear Lord JEsus Christ give us his spirit to pray, and to those who are to govern the Concilium, to seek what is God's, and to forget or [to] despise what is their own, Amen. 1)

1) This preface of Luther's is found in Latin according to the "Fortgesetzte Sammlung von alten und neuen Theologischen Sachen, 1732," p. 997 f., in the Erlangen edition, opp. vur. urZ., torn. VII, x. 536, where the title of the book from which it is taken is thus given: Dros Lpistolae 8nn6ti88iini umrt'ris lc>lmnrU8 llussü 6 enrosre Oou8tariti6N86 ucl Loernos 86riptu6. Ourn xruolutione Älurt. Imtüsi. ViisniderMo 1536. at the end: vitexenciout loMpüus HuZ. 1536. octav. (Ok. Schütze, Ungedruckte Briefe Luthers, III, p. 364.) To this is noted that, although the title says only of three letters of Hussens, but four letters of the same are included in it along with the letter of 57 nobles of Bohemia and Moravia to the Council of Constance on Sept. 2, 1416. The postscript of Luther is missing in this booklet. - That this is not an edition organized by Luther himself (for Luther had the Bohemian letters of Husfen translated into Latin in order to be able to publish them in German), can be assumed: partly from the false title of the booklet, partly from the absence of Luther's postscript. The printer Klug, who printed the German copy, will, while Luther had the postscript

1. I, Magister Johann Hus, in the hope that I am God's servant, wish the grace of God to all believing Bohemians who love God with all their hearts.

002 I have thought, my brethren in Christ, that it is needful to exhort you to consider how my books, which I have written in Bohemian, are condemned as heretical books in the Concilio of Costence, which is full of pride, avarice, and all manner of abominations, which have neither been seen nor read, and though they had been read, yet no man understood them. For at this Concilio there are all whales, Frenchmen, Englishmen, Spaniards, Germans, and people of other languages; unless Bishop John Litomistius 2) had understood it, who was in the same assembly, together with some other Bohemians and priests of Prague, who at the first desecrated and accused both God's truth and our Bohemian land; which I respect, and trust in God that it is full of pious Christians, since they hold God's word and all respectability dear and valuable in it. If you yourselves had been present at Costenz, you would have seen such a council (which is called holy, and wants to be considered as such, as if it could not be mistaken), an abomination and a shameful being. For even the Swabians themselves, as I have heard from them, say that their city of Costenz will not be able to atone for all such sins in thirty years, which were shamefully committed in this concilio; in sum, everyone is angry at such a concilio, and hurts the people that everything is done so shamefully.

003 When I first stood in such a council, to answer for myself against mine adversaries, and saw that it was so without any

The German manuscript of the Schmalkaldic Articles was published in a hurry, before the subsequent speech had come into his hands. From this we can infer that the German copy went out at the beginning of 1537, probably immediately after the production of the Schmalkaldic Articles.

1) The Erlangen edition has this Brie in the first place, but with the note to the second letter: "The date shows that this was the first letter and the first the other." The Wittenberg edition has accordingly rearranged the two letters. In fact, the third letter of June 10 is the first, the second of June 24 the second, the first of June 26 the third, the fourth of June 27 the fourth.

2) Instead of "Litomistius" it says in the Wittenberg and Erlangen editions: "zu Lytomiß".

I said, I had been mistaken; it ought to be more honest, better, and more orderly in this council. Then the chief cardinal came upon me, and said, Dost thou let thyself be heard here? in the castle thou spakest more modestly. But I said unto him, In the castle there was no such shouting about me, but now ye all shout at once.

004 Because therefore no order at all is kept in this Council, and more evil than good is done therein, let not the judgment which is pronounced against my books frighten you, my dear Christians and brethren. You will see and learn that they will be scattered like moths, and their doctrine and judgment will endure like cobwebs. They tried me to see if they could deter me from the truth of Christ, but they could not overcome God's strength in me. Thus, they never dared to contend with me in the Holy Scriptures, as many well-born gentlemen will testify, who were willing to suffer all disgrace for the sake of God's truth, and who stood with me; especially the well-born Lord Wenceslaus of Duben, and Lord John of Chlum 3); for Emperor Sigmund allowed these two into the Council. Afterwards, when I said: I wanted to be expelled, if I had erred, the aforementioned gentlemen heard that the highest Cardinal answered, and said: If you want to be expelled, then you must first recant all your doctrine, as fifty Doctores Theologiä (they were great sophists) will tell you. How think ye of him? Does not this mean finely instructed? In the same way we read of the holy virgin Catharine, that she was to deny the truth and the faith of Christ, because fifty masters stood against her; but the pious virgin would not, but held to the faith of Christ unto death, and still converted the same fifty masters to the faith; but I could not convert these.

005 All this, brethren, I have written unto you for this cause, that ye may know that it was not with holy writ, nor with any other due manner, but with terror and dread alone, that I was set before me to recant. But the merciful God, whose word I have esteemed glorious and great, has been with me, and still is, and will continue to be with me, as I have confidence in him, and keep me in his grace even unto death. Amen.

3) Wittenberger and Erlanger:

"Clüm".

Given on Wednesday after St. John the Baptist [June 26, 1415], in prison, as I await death, although God keeps His judgment so secretly that I must not say that this is my last writing, for the Almighty God can still well save me. Amen.

Copy of the other letter.

1. I, Magister Johann Hus, in the hope that I am God's servant, wish all believers who love God and His Word the knowledge of the truth and the grace of God.

002 Brethren, I have sent you an admonition that ye should neither be dismayed nor alarmed at the fact that mine adversaries have determined to burn my books, but consider how the prophet Jeremiah was also met with by his people, and yet his preaching was not suppressed thereby, for when they had burned it, God commanded that it should be written again, and more fully, as it was done. For when the prophet Jeremiah was in prison, he had his scribe Baruch with him, who recorded such sermons again from his mouth; as is shown in the prophecy of Jeremiah, either in the 35th or 45th chapter. So also it is written in the book of the Maccabees, how they burned the Bible, and slew them that were found with it.

(3) The like is also found in the histories, that the tyrants, after the birth of Christ, burned the saints together with the books. Some cardinals burned many books of St. Gregory, and would not have left any if God had not prevented it through Peter, the servant of Gregory. Item, two Concilia have condemned the holy teacher Chrysostom as a heretic, and yet their false judgment has finally come to light after the death of the holy man.

004 Let such histories be a warning unto you, that ye either read not my books for fear, or give them to my adversaries to burn; but remember the word of our Saviour, and strengthen yourselves with him that saith Matt. 24: "There shall be great tribulation before the last day, such as never was since the foundation of the world: neither shall it come to pass, that, if it were possible, even the elect should be deceived into error; but for the same those days shall be shortened." Remember this exhortation, brethren, and be ye

1) It is Jer. 36, 28.

I trust in God that the school of the Antichrist will fear you and leave you well satisfied, and the Concilio of Costence will hardly reach Bohemia; and I am sure there are many of them who will die before they take my books from you. Yes, they will be driven away from this Concilio now and then, like storks, and in winter they will learn what they have done this summer.

005 Behold, they have condemned their head, the pope, to death for some abominable sin. Where then are the pope's preachers? Let them answer to this, who cry out of the pulpit, that the pope is a god on earth, that he may not sell that which is holy; as the lawyers say, that he is the head of the holy Christian church, for he governs it; that he is the heart of the Christian church, for he makes it live spiritually; that he is the fountain from which all virtue and all good spring; that he is the sun of the holy Christian church; that he is the treasure in which all Christians should have a refuge. Behold, this head is cut off by the sword. The earthly god is bound, and his sins are manifest in the day. This fountain is dried up, this sun is gone out, the heart is torn out of the body and cast away, so that no one may have recourse to him.

006 They also condemned the pope in the council for selling indulgences, bishoprics, benefices, and the like, for money; but many have sat in such judgment, who themselves have bought such things of the pope, and sold them to others. For bishop John Litomistius (who was also present) twice wanted to buy the bishopric of Prague, but others beat him to it. Are these not naughty boys? They do not pull the beam out of their eye, but their own rights say: Whoever buys a prelacy with money, it shall be taken from him. Now buy, or sell, or deal in between, whoever will, they shall be publicly condemned. In this way Peter condemned and banished Simon, because he wanted to buy the Holy Spirit for money.

007 Therefore it came to pass in this council, that the pope was condemned and banished, because he did such merchandising; but they, who bought it of him, and caused such an act to be done, go free. Yes, even in the Concilio they have gone about with such ruthlessness; 3) for here in Costence there are two of them, one who has sold the bishopric, another who has sold the bishopric, and another who has sold the bishopric.

2) In the other relation: "desperate".

But the pope took money from both of them and confirmed the purchase. You know that such things also happen in Bohemia. But if God had willed that in such a council God would have said: He who is without sin among you, let him pass sentence against Pope John; without doubt one after the other would have turned out. Why did they bow down to him before this time, kiss his feet, and call him Most Holy, since they knew and saw that he was a heretic, a murderer, and a damned sinner, as they brought all these things upon him publicly? Yes, why did the cardinals choose such a one, since they knew that he had killed the previous pope? Why did they permit him, since he was already pope, to make and do such a bargain with the saint? For therefore they are his counsellors, that they should tell him what is best, and keep to it; but because they do not do so, are they not as guilty as he, and especially because they themselves have helped him to many things? Why was no one allowed to reproach him with this before the concilium began, but feared him as the holy of holies? But now, because the temporal government, by God's providence and decree, has imprisoned him, they are all helping one another to put him to death. I ever think that one can see in the Pope and others at this Concilio that the abominable, shameful nature of the Antichrist has come to light, and the pious Christians will no doubt now understand what Christ meant by this, since he says: "When you shall see the abomination of desolation; since Daniel said of" 2c. Matt. 24, "He that ran this, let him mark it." I mean ever, that the exceeding pride, avarice, and simony, is the right abomination in the wilderness, that is, among the prelates, where there is no sense of piety, humility, or other virtue.

8. I would have a good mind, if I had time enough, to write to you about all the wickedness and wickedness that I have now experienced among the people, so that the more pious Christians may beware of it; But I trust in God, that he will raise up others after me, who will do more nobly, as there are already some of them, and will bring the evil of the Antichrist clearly to light, and will gladly give their life to death for the truth of our Lord Christ, which Lord Christ will give me and you eternal life, amen. Given on the day of St. John the Baptist [June 24, 1415], in prison and in chains, with the thought that St. John was beheaded in prison for the sake of the word of God.

Copy of the third missive.

1. I, Magister Johann Hus, in the hope that I am God's servant, wish all believing Bohemians who love God that they may live and die in the grace of God, and finally become eternally blessed, Amen.

002 I ye mighty, rich, and poor, I beseech and exhort you to be obedient to God, to magnify his word, and to live according to it.

(3) I beseech you that ye abide in the truth of God, which I have preached unto you out of his word, and out of the holy teachers, and have written unto you.

004 I pray also, if any man among you shall have heard of me in public preaching, or otherwise, or have read any thing in my books, contrary to the truth of God, that he receive it not, though I know not that I have written or spoken any such thing.

005 I pray also, if any man have ever known any levity in my words, or in my doings, that he would not do so unto me, but pray God for me, that he would forbear such levity.

006 I beseech you that ye love and esteem above others the priests who are well kept in their profession, and especially those who labor in the word of God.

007 I beseech you, beware of the wicked, and especially of ungodly ministers; for the LORD hath said of them, that they walk in sheep's clothing, but within they are ravening wolves.

008 Gentlemen, I beseech you, take good care of your subjects, and keep good order.

009 I beseech you, ye citizens, that every man so live in his estate, that he may have a good conscience.

010 Ye workmen, I beseech you, work faithfully, and get your food with the fear of God.

011 Ye servants, I beseech you, serve your masters faithfully.

012 O schoolmasters, I beseech you, let the youth be commanded unto you, that ye lead an honourable life, and teach them diligently and faithfully: first, that they fear God, and have him before their eyes; then, that they study with all diligence, not for covetousness, or temporal honour, but for the honour of God, for the common good, and for their own salvation.

013 Ye students in the university, and all other students, I beseech you, be obedient to your masters in all that is honest and praiseworthy, and follow their good behavior, and study diligently, that God's glory may be increased by you, and that ye and other people may be improved thereby.

14. Finally, I ask all of you to thank diligently the well-born gentlemen, Mr. Bohuslaw of Duben, Mr. Johann of Chlum, 1) Mr. Heinrich Plumlau, Mr. Wilhelm <sup>Zagetz</sup>, 2) Mr. Niclasen, and other gentlemen from Bohemia, Moravia, and Poland, and to put up with their diligence, for they have repeatedly set themselves against the whole council, and have defended the truth manfully, and with all their might have set upon them to <sup>make</sup> me free; Especially Mr. Wenceslaus of Duben and Mr. John of Chlum, whom you may well believe in all the report they will make of this action, for they have been present many days while I have been answering before the council, and know who the Bohemians are who have so unreasonably and grievously accused me, and how the whole assembly has cried out against me, and I have answered everything that has been asked.

(15) I also beseech you that you pray earnestly for the Roman king and your king, together with his spouse, your queen, that the merciful God may be with them and you here and there forever, amen.

(16) I have written this letter in prison and on the chains, and I await the judgment of the Council tomorrow that I am to be burned. But I have complete trust in <sup>God</sup>, that he will not abandon me, nor admit that I deny his truth, or confess the errors by conspiring, which have been attributed to me with falsehood by false witnesses. But how kindly <sup>God</sup>, my Lord, deals with me, and stands by me in wondrous temptations, you will learn when we see each other again in the joy of the life to come, through the help of Christ.

017 I hear nothing of my dear companion, Magistro Hieronymo, except that he is scarcely a prisoner, and awaits death, as I do, for the faith which he has honestly shown against the Bohemians; but they, the Bohemians, our worst enemies, have given us into other enemies' custody and prison; I beseech you, pray <sup>[to] God for them</sup>.

018 Above all these things I beseech you in Prague, that ye love the churches of Bethlehem 3) (so called), and be diligent, as long as <sup>God</sup> giveth grace that the word of <sup>God may be</sup> preached therein: for the devil is peculiarly in that church, and hath set the priests and the bishops against it.

1) Here also the Wittenberg and Erlangen editions: "Chlum".

2) In the external redaction: "von Zatz".

3) This is the name of the church where John Hus preached.

because he realizes that his kingdom will be greatly broken up by this. But I hope to <sup>God</sup> that He will keep the same church as long as He wills, and let His word increase in it through others more than has happened through me, a poor man.

(19) I also beseech you to love one another, and to keep the truth from none, and to take heed that the pious be not oppressed. Given on Monday night, before Saint Vitus' Day <sup>[10 June 1415]</sup>, 4) by a righteous messenger.

Copy of the fourth missive.

<sup>God</sup> be with you, my dearest in <sup>God</sup>! I have had much cause to think that the letter I wrote next would be the last, because the goal of death was so near to me. But now, because I hear that it has passed, it is a joy to me that I should write to you more, and now I write once more that I may show myself to you as a grateful one. As much, however, concerns my death, <sup>God</sup> knows well what the cause is that I and my dear brother, Magister Jerome, <sup>are</sup> not yet judged; who, as I hope, will die holy and entirely innocent, and knows that he is now much more willing to suffer and die than I poor sinner. For this reason <sup>God</sup> has kept us in prison so long that we might the more carefully consider the sin we have committed and the more confidently repent of it, and has given us time enough for the long and difficult trial to eradicate the great sins, and for the consolation to be the more abundant. <sup>For</sup> this cause also he hath given us sufficient time, that we might consider the more fully the shameful <sup>infirmities</sup>, and the horrible death of our dear King the Lord Christ, and be the more confident of suffering, and so learn that eternal joy cannot be attained by the joy of this world, but that through much tribulation and anguish the saints have entered into the kingdom of heaven. For some of them were cut in pieces, some were speared, some were boiled, some were roasted, some were maltreated alive, some were buried alive, some were stoned, some were crucified, some were ground between millstones, and some were dragged to and fro until they died. Some have been drowned, burned, chained, torn to pieces, and before they were have died shamefully and miserably in the dungeon. But who would dare to recount all the tortures and torments inflicted on the saints in the Old Testament and afterward, especially those that were inflicted on the clergy and revealed their wickedness? Therefore it would be a miracle if all misfortune were not now inflicted on those who punish evil, but especially on the clergy, who want to go unpunished. I am glad that they have read my books, in which I have painted their wickedness, and I know that they have read them more diligently than the holy gospel, but that they have found something to blame. Given on Thursday before St. Peter's evening 1) [27 June 1415].

True description of the last action, so with the holy man Johann Hus is made, hundred years ago by one recorded, who has been with and has seen everything himself.

When the sentence against Johann Hussen was read, he contradicted several points, and answered them, although he had been forbidden to answer before, and especially when it was read to him that he was stiff-necked in his error and heresy, he answered it with a loud voice, and said: I have never been stiff-necked, but I have always desired, and still desire to this day, better instruction from the holy Scriptures; yea, I say to this day, if I could destroy and overcome all error with one word, I would most gladly do so. And when all his books, both in the Bohemian, Latin, or German language, were condemned as suspected of heresy, and were recognized by the sentence to be burned, which then also some were burned afterwards, as the booklet of the church, and against the Paletz, 2) also against the Stanilaum: then Johann Hus answered their sentence and said: Why do you condemn my books? For I have always desired and asked that ye should show me better writings than I have set in mine, and I desire it to this day, but

1) Here we have been forced to accept the time given by the other redaction. Walch offers: "Thursday before St. Peter's chain celebration," that is, July 29, 1415. But Hus had already been burned on July 6. Therefore "St. Peter's evening" is to be taken as the vigil of St. Peter's and St. Paul's day; the day before that was a Thursday.

2) "Paletz" is the former friend and college of Husen, Stephan von Palecz. He had resigned from Hus out of fear.

You have never brought up a righteous scripture against him, or shown me a single word from mine to be erroneous; but my books, brought into the common Bohemian language or into other languages, how can you condemn them, when you have never seen them? But they would not hear his word, but continued to proceed against him with the sentence. And when they read this sentence against him, he lay on his knees, and looked up to heaven, and prayed, and especially prayed for his enemies, saying, O Lord JESUS CHRIST, I beseech thee, forgive all my enemies their iniquity for thy great mercy's sake; for thou knowest that they have falsely accused me, brought false witnesses against me, and fabricated false articles against me; these things thou wilt pardon them for thy immense mercy's sake. When John Hus had said this, the bishops and the others in the Concilio looked at him quite angrily, and laughed him to scorn. Then the seven bishops had the measuring instruments brought and had him dressed as if he were now to say mass. And when he had put on the vesture, he said thus with a loud voice, My Lord Jesus Christ, when he was led from Herod to Pilate, he was mocked in a white vesture. 2c. And when he was clothed, the seven bishops that should profane him stood by him, and exhorted him that he should yet recant and abjure. Then Master John Hus arose and stood on the table that was prepared before him, and he turned with great pain against the people and all those who stood by him: Behold, these bishops exhort me that I should recant and abjure, but I fear to do so, lest I be false in the sight of God, and lest I violate my conscience and God's truth, because I have never kept these articles, if they falsely testify against me, but rather have kept, taught, written, and preached the contrary in those which are false. For this cause also, that I should not give offence to such a multitude as I have preached, and also to others that faithfully preach the word of God. And when he had said this, the bishops, and the rest, their fellow members of the council, said, "We see and hear how stubborn he is in his wickedness and heresy; and they sent him away. And as soon as he came down from the table, the said bishops began to profane him, and first took the cup out of his hands, saying thus, "This is a curse; O cursed Judah, why hast thou forsaken the counsel of peace, and hast contended with the Jews?" we take from you this cup of salvation. John Hus answered with a loud voice and said: I believe in GOD the LORD Almighty, for whose name's sake I will bear this shame patiently, so I know that he will never take the cup of his eternal redemption from me, but I hope continually that I shall drink the same today in his kingdom. After this they took from him also all the other garments of the mass, as casel, stol 2c. And to each of them they spoke the words of the curse, as aforesaid, after their manner. And John Hus also answered at all times, that he would willingly suffer such blasphemy and dishonor for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Now that they had, as I said, taken all the chasuble from him, they also wanted to take the plate from him: so they quarreled among themselves, some wanting it to be cut off with a shearing knife; others said it would be enough to make him a scabbard with a pair of scissors. And when they could not agree on the matter, John Hus turned back toward the king, who was sitting on his chair, and said to the king, "Behold, most gracious lord, what is happening here, yet these poor people cannot agree in this blasphemy against me. At last they took a pair of scissors, and cut off all his hair, back and front, and said: Now the holy church hath taken away all her right from thee, and the church hath henceforth nothing more to do with thee, therefore we will now deliver thee into the secular hand. And they put a paper hat upon his head, and said unto him in other words, We now commit thy soul to the devil. But John Hus, with his hands fallen and his eyes lifted up to heaven, said, "I commend it to the most gracious Lord, Jesus Christ. And when they had put on him the crown of blasphemy, he said, My Lord Jesus Christ hath borne for me, a poor man, much, much harder and heavier crown of thorns, innocently unto his death; therefore I, a poor sinner, will willingly wear this crown of blasphemy for his name's sake, though it be lighter. But there was a round paper hat, near the height of an elbow, and on it were painted three horrible devils, and the title of his cause was written in Latin: Hie ost NuorosiaroJa. This is interpreted: This is the arch-heretic. And when they had done this, they cried aloud, saying: This holy assembly of Costence, considering that it has no more to do with John Hussein in the church of God, delivers him up here to the temporal court, and has recognized that such temporal court is henceforth.

And the king said to Duke Louis of Bavaria, standing before him, holding the apple of gold with the cross in his hands. Then the king said to Duke Louis of Bavaria, who stood before him holding the golden apple with the cross in his hands: Go, receive it. And he went and received it, and delivered it into the hands of the officers, and accompanied him also unto death. And when John Hus, thus crowned, was led out of the said church, at that very hour they burned his books in the churchyard. When John Hus saw this and was led past, he smiled, as it were, at their foolishness. And when he was thus led, he admonished all the bystanders that he had been guilty of death because of the errors that had been falsely attributed to him, and because of false witnesses who were also his mortal enemies. Nearly all the people of the city who lived there were in armor and escorted him to his death. And when he came to the place of torture, he fell on his knees, and lifted up his hands and his eyes to heaven, and began devoutly to pray some psalms, as Esororo iriei, Dons oto. and: In to Domino sporuvi. In the same prayers he said especially heartily and with a joyful countenance, so that it was heard by many bystanders: O Lord, today into your hands I commend my spirit. Now the place of his torture was in a meadow before the city, between the gardens, as one goes from Costenz to Gottlieben 1). Some laymen, however, who were standing around, said: This man may have done what he will, we know not; but yet we hear now of him holy words, which he speaketh and prayeth here. Some of them said, "It would be good for him to have a confessor. But a cowardly priest was sitting on a horse, dressed in green and lined with red silk, and he said to them: Let him not be heard, neither let him have a confessor, for he is a heretic. But he had previously confessed to a doctor and monk, who had also heard him kindly and absolved him, as he himself confessed in a note that he sent to his friends from prison. And now, as he lay on his knees praying, the blasphemous hat fell from his head, on which, as has been said, were painted three devils; and when he saw the hat lying before him, he smiled. But some of the mercenaries said to the others who were about: Put the crown back on his head, that it may be burned here with his lords whom he served. After this the executioner called him as-

Who arose from prayer. And when he arose, he said with a loud voice, so that all who were about might hear, O Lord Jesus, I will patiently suffer this shameful and horrible death with your help, for your name's sake and for the testimony of your saving word. Immediately he was led around to the bystanders, whom he begged and admonished to refrain from thinking and believing that he had taught or preached such articles as were thus laid upon him by false witnesses. Now when the executioner had stripped him of his clothes, they bound him with their hands behind them to a pillar which the beades had dug into the ground beforehand and set firmly in place; and when they had taught him facing toward the morning, some of the most powerful men who were about said, Let him not be turned toward the morning, for he is a heretic; and they commanded him to be turned toward the evening. Then the executioner and his men did so. Then they put rusty chains around his neck. When he saw them, he smiled and said to the executioners, "My Lord Jesus Christ, our Savior and Redeemer, was also bound with a heavy chain; therefore I, a poor, meager, sinful man, will not be ashamed to wear these chains for his name's sake. And they had put under his feet several bundles of straw and wood; and when he was thus bound to the pillar, he still had his shoes on, and an iron fetter on his feet: and they put straw and wood of the lowest kind about him, even unto his knees. And before the executioner lit the fire, the emperor's marshal, who was called Pappenheim, and Duke Ludwig of Bavaria came to him and admonished him that he should spare his life and recant what he had preached and taught and renounce it. But Master John Hus looked up to heaven, and answered with a loud voice, saying, "O God, you are my witness that I have never taught or preached the things which are laid to my charge by false witnesses; but the chief part of my preaching and my mind has been directed to that end, that I alone might save men from sin. But in the truth of the gospel, which I have written, taught, and preached out of the sayings and interpretations of the holy teachers, I will gladly die today. And when they heard this, the marshal and the duke of Bavaria struck their hands together and rode away. Then the executioners lit the fire, and Johann Hus cried out with a loud voice sung once: Christe, thou Son of the living God, have mercy on us. And once more, Christ, thou Son of the living God, have mercy on me. And when he began to sing the third time, the wind smote him in the face with the tan. So he prayed within himself, and bowed his head, as though one would pray three Our Fathers, and so passed away. Now when the wood and straw were all burned up, the body still hung by the neck on the pillar; then the executioners cut down the body with the pillar, and stirred up the fire, that the body should burn so much before; and when they found the head, they smote the same in pieces 1) with a club, and cast it again into the fire. And when they had found his heart also under his bowels, they sharpened a rod, and put it thereon like a roast, and roasted it, and brake it in pieces, and burned it. Finally, when they had burned the whole body to ashes, they took the ashes with all the fires, and put them on a cart, and led it into the river Rhine, which was flowing by.

Public writing of several lords of Bohemia and Moravia, addressed to the Concilium at Costenz, after the innocent death of the holy martyr Johann Hus.

September 2, 1415.

1) To the worthy Fathers in Christ, Cardinals, Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops, Embassies, Magisters and Doctors, and to the whole Concilio at Costenz, the well-born Lords of the Christian Kingdom of Bohemia and Margraviate of Moravia wish grace and keeping of the commandments of our Lord JEsu Christ.

2. Because not only the word of God, but also the natural law, commandeth all men whatsoever any man would that it should be done unto him, that he should do it unto others also; and it is contrary to such a commandment of God and nature, to do unto others that which any man would gladly do unto himself (for Christ saith, "Whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so unto them: this is the law, and all the prophets;" and Paul: "Love fulfils the law," and again, "The whole law depends on your loving your neighbour as yourself."), we take our neighbour and dear brother, Magister Johann Hussen, of holy memory, who was a Christian preacher of the holy Gospel, with all right, and was sentenced to death by you a few days ago 1) in your Concilio (from what spirit, we do not know) as a stiff-necked heretic, and after the verdict is judged with a cruel and ignominious death, our Kingdom of Bohemia and Margraviate of Moravia to eternal disgrace, because he did not want to confess the errors that were falsely laid on him, but yet could not be brought upon him. For his and our kingdom's and margraviate Moravia's enemies and traitors, with all untruth, have led nothing but vain fictitious and wanton false charges and accusations against him. Therefore we were caused to write from the aforementioned innocent man, Johann Hussen, and your ungodly judgment to Costence to our most noble prince and lord, Lord Siegmund, Roman and Hungarian king, our hereditary and future lord, which writing was publicly read and recited in your assembly, and then burned to our shame and disgrace, as we credibly report.

3. For this reason we have also now wished to send your Highness in general this public writing by the aforementioned Magistro, Johann Hussen, in which we confess and testify with heart and mouth before you and everyone that he, Johann Hus, was a pious, just and Christian man, and has kept himself honest and well in our kingdom, and with all diligence has faithfully taught the Old and New Testament to us and our subjects, and besides has preached with all seriousness against all heresies and heresies, and has warned us that we (as is due to all Christians) should flee and hate them. Item, to unity and Christian love he has directed everyone with all diligence by preaching, writings and his own conduct and character, so also that we cannot have noticed anything else about him (because we had great respect for it), but that he is Christian and right, and rightly, without all vexation, that he taught and lived among us, yes, that he also, by his godly and quiet conduct, incited everyone to keep God's commandment and to follow the holy life of the holy fathers, so that the Christian church might be increased and the people improved, by preaching and by his own examples.

4th Now you have not been content with this, that you have so unjustly condemned and miserably judged the same magistrate, Johann Hussen, to the shame of us and our kingdom and margraviate, but have also condemned the honorable Hiero-nymum of Prague, a most learned man, a magistrate of the seven liberal arts, and a skilled philosopher, before you have seen him with your eyes or interrogated him, or convicted him of some error, solely on the ground of unfounded false accusation by his and all our enemies and traitors, imprisoned without all mercy, bound and miserably martyred, and perhaps 2) now also, like Johann Hussen, cruelly strangled.

5. About all this we are also informed, as we can see from your writings, and cannot write without pain, that some hostile people, enemies and traitors to our kingdom and margraviate, have grievously accused before you and before the whole Council the kingdom and margraviate you were thinking of, and have carried it within you, although without all truth, that in the said kingdom and margraviate many errors and sects arise, and grow daily, thereby poisoning many pious hearts; Therefore, unless severe punishments are taken against them in time, it is to be feared that in the said kingdom and margraviate irreparable harm will come to souls. We cannot suffer such horrible and burdensome injustices, which are imposed on our kingdom and margraviate unreasonably and without truth, especially because, by the grace of God, from the time our people first came to the Christian faith, we have kept ourselves so well and unrepentantly in our kingdom and margraviate, that the holy mother, the Christian church, has never had any complaint against us, and we have always diligently adhered to her through cheap obedience, since this has otherwise often happened in other kingdoms, that they have wavered in the faith, and have adhered to the parties of the unbelievers and the godless pope 3). But what pains and costs we have spent on this, and in what honor and adornment we have held the holy mother, the Christian church, and her shepherds and pastors, together with our princes and subjects, we hope it is as clear in the day as the dear sun, and indeed you yourselves, if you wish otherwise, must help to bear witness to this.

006 Now that we may keep our honour before God and man, not for our own sake alone, but for the honour of the said high-praised kingdom and margraviate, as we ought to do towards our neighbour, we have, out of a Christian and right trust in our neighbour, given him the right to our honour.

2) So Jerome of Prague had not yet been executed at the time of this writing.

3) In the other relation: "of the godless popes".

Dear Lord Jesus Christ, and of a pure good conscience and heart, with this writing we wish to denounce our opinion and mind to your Highness and to all believers in Christ, and speak freely to testify our innocence: that all and all men, whatever their rank, power and dignity, who say and claim for a truth that in the former kingdom and margraviate some kind of heresy or error has arisen, and that we or others have been tainted with it, that such mendacious and devious knaves are traitors and enemies to our kingdom and margraviate, yea, that they themselves are such heretics as they make us out to be, full of all evil, and children of the devil, who hath been a liar from the beginning, and is still a father of lies. And we do not want to exclude anyone from such accusations, except the most noble prince and lord, Lord Siegmund, Roman and Hungarian king, our hereditary and future lord, to whom we are sure that he will think much differently of us than to accuse such boys of lying to us. But we will keep to ourselves, and complain of such unfortunate disgrace to our righteous God, who has reserved for him all punishment, and can well pay all pride and hope. We also want to let this reach the future pope, whom God will decree to be the unanimous and right shepherd of His Church, and for God's sake, as it is the duty of pious children, honor and obey him in everything that is just, honest, and divine, with humble request that he help our kingdom and margraviate in all that we shall report in our letter, according to the gospel of our dear lord Jesus Christ, and according to the statutes of the holy fathers, where necessity shall require it; But so that this, which we now confess and have already committed ourselves to, may not be broken off. For we will not only lay up our goods, but also life and limb for our preachers, who faithfully preach the testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, and are godly, quiet, and constant, regardless of all deceitfulness, or other human statutes and rules that are not in accordance with the Holy Scriptures. By God's command. Date at Prague, in the year after Christ's birth 1415, 1) on the second of September, from a whole council of well-born lords.

1) In all editions: "1416". On May 30, 1416, Jerome of Prague was burned. At the time of the writing of this letter this had not yet happened. Moreover, 82 states that Hus was put to death "a few days ago." Therefore, this letter must be dated to the year 1415.

Follow-up address by D. Martin Luther to Johannis Hussen's letters reported above.

To the clergy, who would like to come together at the advertised Concilio, to beware of the example of the Costenzer Concilii.

Mart. Luther.

1. There is no doubt in my mind that whoever reads or hears these letters, if he is otherwise of sound mind or has a conscience before God, must say that there was an excellent, great spirit in this man, John Hus, who writes and teaches so Christianly, who fights so chivalrously against the temptations of death, so patiently and humbly suffers all, and at last so manfully accepts the most shameful death for the truth's sake, among such mighty, great, many, high people, gathered from all over the world, and he stands alone among them, like a little sheep among many lions and wolves. If he is a heretic, no true Christian has ever come to earth. For by what fruits shall a true Christian be known, if these fruits of John Hus be not?

002 Yet hath he done no evil, save that he hath taught: If the pope be not pious, he is not a head of the holy church. He lets him be a head of the church, but not of the holy church. Just as a wicked pastor is a pastor, but not a member of the right saints in a fine parish. So John Hus also said, If the pope be a prankster, he is not pious, though he be the chief of the church. As if you or I said, If Judas be a thief and a traitor, he is not pious, though he be an apostle. But he should have said thus:

If the pope is a rogue and a villain, he is nevertheless holy, cannot err, and all that he does and says is holy, vain articles of faith, and right. This is what the gentlemen in the Costenzer Concilio wanted to hear. Notwithstanding that they themselves condemned and deposed three popes for husks, no one has yet to burn them. But since John Hus had said it, he had to suffer himself.

003 For there was a play upon it: The pope had given indulgences to the world, and had set aside a golden year to Rome to build the church of St. Peter 2c. And among other more Roman and Papal covenants, the pope had promised in his bull to all who died on the way to Rome that they would be led up to heaven by their mouths, and he had also commanded the angels (as an earthly god and God's governor) mightily that they should lead the souls of the dead to heaven without delay. Just as Tetzal, who led the Cardinal's indulgence in Mainz, also taught: When the penny is in the box, lead the soul out of purgatory to heaven. Which whistle they drew in at that time, and still draw in, until they can whistle such a dance again.

004 Now because no ass nor sow could suffer such abominable preaching, if they were men (let us not speak of Christians), John Hus sat down at Prague against it (for he was a preacher in the little church of Bethlehem), and punished them, as if the pope had no power to do such things, and did wrong in them and in other more things. And when he had gone so far as to preach that the pope might do wrong (which at that time must have been much worse heresy than if thou hadst denied Christ), he had to go away and defend this saying: If the pope be a prankster, he is not pious. Then all the swine cried out against him, bristling on their backs, sharpening their trunks, and running together, until they burned him treacherously and wickedly. For this was the highest article of one: the pope cannot err. As also the Jurisperditi from the smoke-hole at Rome say: Aon prassuinitur tantas eslsituckinw apsx srrars, one does not understand himself that such high head errs. With such non-understanding it is unfortunately all too provided.

5. but you have made him so bold with it and

For a heart that knows itself innocent of a deed before God and the world gives a man courage. But if it be done for God's sake, the Holy Spirit, the Comforter of the wicked, is there to help against all the world and devils, as the Lord Christ promised in Matt. 10:20: "It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." And Luc. 21:15: "I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not prevail against."

(6) I have heard from trustworthy people that Emperor Maximilian used to say of Hus: Hey, hey, they have wronged the pious man. And Lraswcu kotsroäsmus in the first treatise, which I still have, publicly writes in print: JohannesHus is oxustus, HON Lvnvi6tu8, that is: Johannes Hus is burned, and never yet overcome. And it has always been said among honest people that violence and injustice were done to him. But I must tell you here that I have heard from Doctor Staupitz himself how his ancestor, Andreas Proles, an excellent, famous man in his time, once talked with him about the rose of Doctor Johann Zachariä. (For the same rose they painted now and then in our monasteries on Zachariä's parret,*) in honor of the order, and to the shame of Johannis Hus.) Now that Proles had looked at the picture: I would traun (said he) not gladly bear the rose with such honours. Whereupon Doctor Staupitz said: How so? Proles gave him this answer:

007 In the Concilio of Costence, when they had acted against Hus, that no man should nor could punish the pope, Zacharias uttered the saying Ezech. 34,10.: Leos, sZo ipss ouxsr ks,8tors8, st of populus, Behold, I will myself over the shepherds, and not the people. But John Hus denied that such word „non populug" was in the place; so Zachariä appealed to Husten's own Biblia, which he had brought with him from Bohemia. For Zacharias had come to him before (as many others had done to persuade him), and had read approximately the same

1) "Parret" --beret.

Biblia read with him in the place. When such a Bible came, it was found to be as Zacharias had said. Here Johann Hussen did not help that he said: This Biblia is false, others have not so, but was overruled, and must have lost. But Zacharias brought the rose of honor from it, which the Concilium gave him for an everlasting remembrance. Proles said further: Now it is true that such a word is not found this day in any true Biblia, nor in printed nor written ones, but they all testify against Zacharias. Hatred ? rols8.

008 And it is true; it is found no other way, but as Hus said, in all the biblia, they are German, Latin, Greek, or Hebrew. But at Costence they would not look upon any of the other bibles, else they would not have given the rose to Zacharias, nor would he have borne it, but John Hus would have kept the victory. Although this would not have helped him, because he did not want to keep an evil pope pious, which they themselves did not keep, as John Hus testifies in these letters. But it can be seen from this that Psater Andreas Proles nevertheless also believed that John Hus had done wrong, and that Zacharias, if he had not atoned, had gone to the devil, even though he stood for a great saint; as D. Staupitz also believed, and I also.

(9) But this is evident everywhere, that even his opponents have confessed (whom I myself heard thirty years ago, of great standing in theology) that he was very highly learned, and more learned than all the doctors in the Concilio, which is also well proved by his books äs Lsolswa and Lsrwonss. And I once at Erfurt, a young theologian, fell in the monastery on the library into a book, where Johannis Hus' sermons were excellent and written therein, and out of curiosity longed to see what the arch-heretic had taught, because the book was kept unburned in the public library, then I truly found so much that I was appalled why such a man was burned, who could so Christianly and mightily lead the Scriptures. But because his name was so horribly condemned that I thought at the time that the walls would turn black and the sun would lose its glow, whoever had heard of him?

I closed the book and went away with a wounded heart. But I comforted myself with these thoughts: Perhaps he wrote such things before he became a heretic; for I did not yet know the history of the Concilii of Costence.

010 The last is the best: they themselves, his adversaries, bear witness most gloriously, though very carelessly, that they ought to be ashamed, if it were possible for them to see with blind eyes. For the scribe who wrote the German Acta of the Concilii with the many shields, who would gladly have made it evil against Hus, says: that John Hus smiled undauntedly when he was degraded; and when he was led to the fire, he always had in his mouth: O JESUS, thou Son of GOD, have mercy on me. And when he saw the tree whereon he was to be burned, he fell upon his knees, and cried out: O JESu, thou Son of GOD, who hast suffered for us, have mercy on me. He also saw a poor peasant carrying wood, and with a gentle smile he spoke the word of St. Hieronymi: Lanota-simplicitas, Oh thou holy simplicity. And a priest came up to him and asked if he wanted to confess. Yes, said Hus, I will gladly confess. But the priest: You but must first recant. No, said Hus, so I know that I am not guilty of any mortal sin.

(11) But now that he has been burned, the island, 1) made of paper, which was put on him for shame, on both sides of which devils painted with the name Haerekiliella, still remain; the executioner had to take them especially and push them into the fire. They write this themselves, and may still read it, whoever wants to, the book recently went out of print again. They interpret it to mean that John Hus was such a poisonous heretic that the devil received the jnfel in the fire; just as the Jews attributed Christ's miraculous signs to Beelzebub.

012 But whosoever therefore shall earnestly suffer in death the Lord Jesus, the Son of God, for us, can call upon such things, and go into the fire with such faith and confession, if he be not a great martyr of Christ, no man shall be saved. For he saith:

1) "Island", inculs, headgear.

"Whosoever shall confess me before the world, him will I confess." Summa, the pope makes many saints, who knows whether they are in hell? This one he hath thrust into hell, that one must surely be in heaven. Be the devil thy saint, and thou the devil's saint, dear pope.

013 But these things have I said once more for a warning unto our wicked lords, which peradventure shall be in the council. For if they commit a Costence Concilium, it will be the same for them, that afterwards it will be said what they have done and forbidden to say.

014 For they also that were at Costence were sure that no man should ever speak or write against them, much less sanctify or glorify John Hus, or condemn them, as they also have so dreadfully forbidden. But John Hus prophesied otherwise, as has been done by many others, and by me in part. But if they think, "There is no need, we are the chiefs," then let this be true in the name of God, as it was true in the time of John Hus. He sitteth still who sat then; but they shall rise, and must vacate the throne. This is not lacking, amen.

Translated from the Latin by bl. i. i. Greis.

001 Now that Paul, of this name the third, Roman Pontiff, has appointed a general council to be held at Mantua, in this year, which is the 1537th from the birth of our Lord Christ, I perceive that some simple-minded people have great hopes of a church reformation and restoration of the pure doctrine. However, I do not doubt in the least that these, according to their simplicity and insincerity, are miserably mistaken and dangerously deceived. For almost all everywhere, both teachers of law and of the Holy Scriptures, likewise notaries, abbots, vicars-general, servants and superiors of the orders, bishops, archbishops, primates, patriarchs, and all cardinals, are so utterly devoted to the Roman Pontiff, and to his obedience and slavery with illicit and the most appalling and obviously impious oaths, and obviously ungodly oaths, that there is no hope that any of them will make an effort with earnestness and zeal for Christ's honor, for the truth of the Gospel, for the purity of the Church, and for the salvation of souls; and that because of infinite danger, which they have to fear, if only a suspicion can be brought upon them, that they have broken their oath or have not kept it right.

002 Since they are afraid of such things for fear of papal tyranny (before which even the mightiest kings tremble), they pay more attention to what the pope shouts than to what is right in the sight of God, with the exception of a very few who have recently returned to Christ as if from error and from a foreign country, and have truly and sincerely repented of their errors and ungodly oaths. But since their hearts are weak in and of themselves, they are still more struck down by the shame of those who are of the same rank, order, and dignity with them; they reproach them with having broken the common oath, and thus compel them, that though they are safe in their conscience before God, yet they are put to shame before the world, turn pale, and must fear the stain of infidelity and perjury. The rest, however, who are learned, honest, and pious men, who could judge and pass judgment unadulteratedly and according to the word of God, when a statement is to be made about controversial matters and doctrine in the Christian religion, are by no means admitted to any council, since they alone would be worthy and skillful to be entrusted with such important matters.

003 Therefore, where the Concilium shall not be free, and therefore truly and purely free, that is, where there shall not be such unlawful, ungodly things as these and abominable oaths in public, detests them from the heart, and abolishes them altogether, and admits several honest and pious men, who are not tainted and infected with such impious and abominable oaths, to judge and adjudicate: then it is impossible that the truth should prevail, and the church of God be advised and its best promoted. For who does not understand that a company of such people is not a Christian concilium, but an open nest of robbers of the most wicked servants of the pope, who have conspired together against Christ and his church? And this is clearly testified by the most shameful death sentence, which was quite innocently inflicted on John Hussein and Jerome of Prague, and since the public peace was broken with him, to the greatest shame of all descendants.

(4) But in order that you, my dear Christian reader, may understand that what has been said of me hitherto is true, and may be able to judge the matter from a sample, just as one recognizes a lion by its claws: behold, I herewith submit to you several formulas of such abominable oaths. The first formula is that oath which the teachers of almost all public, or, to be correct, papal schools, who wish to accept the title of doctor, must swear before they become licentiates, as they call it, that is, before they are permitted to accept the title of doctor. The other formula is that oath which all who become notarii publici by papal power and authority take. The third formula is the oath which all elected bishops must not only swear, but also make in writing and send to Rome before they are consecrated; and this oath is changed and made more difficult now and then, according to the pope's will and tyranny. If one goes through these and considers them diligently, one will easily be able to judge why the doctors, although they are the most unlearned, and the notaries, although they are nothing but clods and purely stupid asses, likewise the bishops, although they are useful to the church neither with their life nor with their teaching, nevertheless in the kingdom of the pope they are preferred to all other learned, honest, honorable, respected, and pious men for such a long time and are revered as gods. For in the short space of a single hour they have learned the art which brings them much profit, and is most agreeable to the Roman court, but most unpleasant to the poor, oppressed, and oppressed church.

harmful and detrimental to the whole commonwealth, namely, to serve the pope, to flatter, to do divine honor, to pervert justice and equity for his sake, and to betray all the secrets of all men when the pope's benefit requires it. I do not speak of the honest and upright men who are left among such people.

5. From this we can at the same time understand why only a few unlearned and washful doctors and sophists, of whom there are many, who are the stains of the present learned world, so brazenly defend the abuses, errors, lies, superstitions, heresies, and idolatries of the papal empire, and nonsensical (though in vain), or, more correctly, quarrel about it rather than argue and wage war, while otherwise so many learned and eloquent men either keep silent altogether, or at least act more sensibly and milderly. For who can doubt that the violence of some jurists against the Word of God and its servants, together with the bishops, who are otherwise the most cowardly sissies, flows from the very source of barbaric tyranny? But it is now time for us to draw out of obscurity, as Hercules drew Cacus out of his cave, the formulas of the most abominable oaths, which have hitherto been diligently concealed out of deceit enough, into the light of day. If, then, Christian reader, you find these oaths detestable and cursable (as they are), pray Christ our Saviour that he himself will see to the best of his church. For nothing good can be hoped from this pernicious conspiratorial group unless it is abolished.

Now follows the ordinary oath which those who wish to become Doctores of Laws or of Sacred Scripture in the Papal Schools must swear before they are given liberty to accept the title of Doctor, with notes.

I, N., Scholar at Ingolstadt, Eichstadt Diocese, will from this hour henceforth<sup>a</sup> be faithful and obedient to St. Peter,<sup>b</sup> ) the Holy Apostolic<sup>c</sup> Roman Church, and our Lord, <sup>d</sup>) Mr. Paulo III, as well as his canonically elected successors. So help me God <sup>u</sup>) and this his holy gospel.

Notes.

I have placed this oath first because it is clearer and more explicit than all the others, since in it the pope recounts all his abominations with the greatest diligence, without any shame, and insists that they be approved, promoted, and defended. And it is, as it were, a picture in which the whole papal empire is most artificially depicted, in which one can recognize the temper and craftiness of the Romanists. For since there are far more doctors than bishops, and since they have the upper hand in the public schools, in the churches, and in the parishes, and since the bishops are officers and vicars of princes and councillors in free cities, they easily saw that if they had made them subservient, they would easily have subdued the whole Roman empire by their assistance. Which also happened. For this reason, in former times the title of doctor was so detested that when a nobleman became a doctor, nothing was thought of him, just as if

1) Also from the confession of the ears. For the seal of confession, since all that is confessed is to be kept secret, is a pure fraud, that the mouth of the laity may be smeared. - This remark is in the margin of the Latin.

whether he had lost his nobility, and even today in most towns no doctor is taken into the council.

a) The pope suspects him of having previously been faithful to Christ and obedient to his word; since this is flatly repugnant to the pope, he is forced to renounce it covertly and by circumlocution, and to conspire with the Roman beast.

(b) This he understands not of the apostle Peter, who for Christ's sake left all things, but of the fancied Pxtus, or, that I may say rightly, of Simon, of whom it is said that he had a very great and important inheritance at Rome, which was brought together by lies, frauds, perjuries, murders, poisonings, and robberies, and was said to consist of nothing but thefts, robberies, and thefts from the church.

c) How the beast endeavors to make the Roman Church out of the apostolic Church, since the apostolic Church is scattered throughout the whole world and is not attached to any particular place!

(d) O you slaves, who are more wicked than your most wicked master! If ye were Christians, ye would know no lord in the spiritual kingdom but Christ, and all things would be yours, even Paul and Cephas; but ye would be Christ's. But now, what nonsense is this, that of your own free will you give yourselves over to Antichrist into his slavery, which is harder than death! By serving him, you make yourselves guilty of all the abominations that are committed in Rome.

e) Here you see how the Roman beast of Pabst loves and cares not only for himself, but also for the least part of his being, namely his flesh, more than for Christ, the gospel, and the church. For this reason he despises it, tramples it underfoot, and suppresses it, and is concerned first of all with his own stomach.

f) Mark this well: the pope invents and roars that the church is his, and not Christ's. O over the beautiful shepherd, yea rather the thief and murderer! The church saith of Christ her head, and not of the pope her persecutor and oppressor, in the Song of Songs, "My friend is mine, and I am his."

(g) Secondly, he is anxious how he may make money, and sets up nets and traps for this purpose. For therein consists the strength of his tyranny, out of which the means of indulgence are presented to the tender and feminine welfare of the papists.

(h) Thou wretched man, thou wilt prevent all that shall be done against the pope. Thou sayest, I will hinder it to the best of my ability. But, dear journeyman, tell me, will you also prevent it if something is done against the pope with the best of reason and according to divine right? even if it should be for the good of the whole church and Christianity? even if those who do such things were your superiors? and if you had sworn an oath of allegiance to them? and if you received an honest salary from them under this title? God have mercy, I hear that none of these things is exempt. Now, now, let yourselves be instructed, you kings, and chastened, you judges on earth, and let it be known what loyalty you can give to such rulers, who have received the title of doctor from the pope, and whom the pope, with such ungodly and frightening oaths, has made obligatory and trained to your ruin.

(i) O poisonous betrayers, and the accomplices of the betrayers, who are far more wicked than Judas the betrayer. For Judas, though it be so, hath openly and openly betrayed Christ; but ye have betrayed him most secretly, and hid it very deeply. He repented of his treachery, and immediately brought back the money, the reward of his treachery, and cast it into the temple. But you act as if you had done well; you rejoice in yourselves over it, and the reward of your treachery, namely, the high offices, prebendaries, and prelatures, you hold fast, and boast with it, and live on it in all pleasures. You, like Judas, are worthy to be hanged.

(k) Thirdly, he is preparing his secret and cunning plots. It should be noted, however, that if a papal doctor takes an oath of allegiance to a prince or republic that has something against the pope, then he will either betray his master or break this oath. Now what a "freak" is a papal doctor who cannot be faithful without malice, nor an honest man without perjury!

l) Fourth, he endeavors to fortify and establish his tyranny, for the preservation of which he contends no other than for life and limb, for house and court, and mixes, blends, and perverts all things divine and human at the same time. But he rightly calls it the Roman papacy, because in fact and truth it is nothing else than a papacy, not an apostleship. And therefore he calls it only the Roman papacy, but not also the Christian papacy. The regalia of Peter are to be taken in the same way, since they are not given by Christ, but the popes have taken them from the kings either by trickery or by force.

m) Is it also against Christ himself? For he also, as he is true God, so is he also true man. But why do we doubt this, since he excludes no one at all, and Christ has forbidden the papacy by name, saying, "Worldly kings reign, but you do not so reign." So now the papacy would be defended in vain, if it were not also to be defended against the man Christ. O abominable abominations! O wickedness! O infernal furies!

(n) How about lies, trickery, deceit? how about conspiracies, treacheries, and seditions? how about poisonings, murders, robberies, unjust wars? What dost thou long ask? Since the papacy is contrary to the word of Christ, it cannot be defended in a lawful way. Therefore it is necessary that by it be understood all unlawful and wicked kinds of help from its helpers and defenders. O this is a conspiracy, which has sprung up with the aid of the infernal Furies, in which Christ is not only denied, but a public war is also declared against him.

o) Fifth, he thinks of the growth of his tyranny. And note that no doctor can really and emphatically increase the authority, privileges, and rights of the pope. For no one can do this except by gifts or the granting of new rights. This only kings and emperors can do, but the doctors, because they are too weak and too few, are not in the habit of doing. Therefore, all that is left is that they can do this in no other way than by perverting the laws and sacred Scripture, and that they can do it only by means of gifts or the granting of new rights.

that they pronounce unjust sentences in courts and councils to please the pope.

p) Sixth, he was concerned about the tranquility and security of his tyranny. But since the statutes, ordinances, decrees, and commands of the pope are in part contrary to the word of God, it is certain that whoever walks according to them renounces the word of God. For no one can serve two masters.

q) In the seventh place, he is provided for his satellites, as the helpers of his tyranny. And in time past he prescribed thus concerning the envoy: That envoy of whom I shall know for certain that he is an envoy of the apostolic see 2c. But now that licentiousness has increased infinitely, he compels that all envoys without exception should be helped. For he would rather that the false should be helped than that the true should be left in distress.

r) Last of all, he also pretends to his human statutes, lies, and seductions. For he does not respect the heretics who are truly heretics, if only they do no harm to his tyranny. But he alone persecutes as heretics those who undertake to confront his vices and errors, idolatries and blasphemies, and to deny them with the word of God. Just as he alone calls those soUsirmtios who pay nothing and do not submit to subtle tyranny. But the others, who are truly schismatic, who say: I hold with Paul, I with Apollo, I with Cephas, I with Benedictus, I with Dominicas, I with Franciscus, I with Bernard, 2c., and moreover wretchedly disrupt the church with their dissensions and divisions, as the wretched so-called Dominicans of Bern have done, he accepts them as his beloved sons with great love, and encourages them all.

s) He calls those rebels who defend Christian liberty in spiritual matters against the papal ordinances of men, and in temporal matters seek to protect their right, though rightfully, against his tyranny. For those who truly oppose Christ and the church, that is, who trample on his commands with knowledge and will, are held in high esteem by him.

t) As far as I hear, the papal doctors are not to overcome the heretics, schismatics and rebels with disputes, not with explanations of the law, not with instruction from holy Scripture, not with the pronouncement of just judgments in courts and conciliums, and to bring them to better thoughts. For none of these things can be done against those whom the pope mendaciously reproaches for heretics, in that they have divine right and the word of God for themselves, but he holds that they must be persecuted and disputed by force, as you hear, by force, I say. But since such teachers are not permitted to wage a public and lawful war, I do not see how they can persecute anyone according to ability, unless they either put him out of the way with poison, or kill him by a secret and deceitful assassination. What wonder, then, that there should be so great a number of poisoners, assassins, and bandits in the Papal kingdom, since even the Papal teachers are nothing else (so much as appears from this oath) but poisoners, assassins, bandits, and highwaymen conspiring together?

u) O thou threefold and fourfold wretched and desperate wretch, who thus swearest. O wretched are thy Parents, who have turned their fortunes and expenses to thee; End to thee, that thou shouldst so ungodly conspire and curse thy soul's blessedness. For if thou wilt keep this oath, thou shalt contend against Christ for the Antichrist, and become a betrayer of the sacrament by which thou wast brought and joined to Christ in holy baptism. But if thou wilt not keep the oath, then thou wilt consent that thou wilt have neither God for thy succor, nor his gospel for the means of thy salvation. Therefore, wake up once, and see what great danger you are in; repent, and ask God to set you free again through his power, and to revoke such an ungodly oath and bring it to eternal oblivion, so that you will not be eternally condemned, amen.

End of notes.

Here I wish to remind you, first of all, not only of those doctores who have received their doctorate at those schools where such oaths are not required (as at this time in Germany the universities of Wittenberg and Tübingen, in England all of them, and in Italy, if the rumor is otherwise true, one and the other are free of them, and are therefore truly blessed), but also those who, though they have been deceived and ensnared by the cunning and deceit of the papists, and have sworn this oath either unwillingly or without deliberation, yet now heartily abhor and forsake the same as something ungodly and accursed, and publicly manifest this by words and deeds. All these, I say, I will remind them that all this that is said here is none of their business.

I will now ask all other honest and pious men to despise none of such people for the sake of the title of doctor, or that he has taken such an oath in the past, but rather to love him, or at least to forgive him his error. For those are worthy of praise and love who have combined useful and necessary scholarship with public authority, if they use it only for the glory of God and the common good, and contribute nothing to the consolidation of the tyranny of the pope. Rather, let them direct the whole disfavor and curse of this frightful and abominable conspiracy on those doctors alone who, as they have sworn with good forethought and deliberation, so also persist in the resolution to maintain such an abominable oath, and pour out all their venom against the rising Gospel for their Roman idol.

Moreover, if anyone afterwards, having already been reminded of this abomination and made sure of it, swears with knowledge and deliberation

He will not be able to invent any reason why he should not be considered a most wicked, horrible, and accursed man by all honest and pious people. Therefore beware, for thou knowest not whether it may be changed before evening.

Now follows the formula of the oath, which the public notaries created by the pope must take, and which is for the most part the same as the preceding oath formula.

I, N., will henceforth be faithful to St. Peter and the Holy Roman Church, and to our Lord, Pope Julio the Other, as well as to his canonically elected successors. Nor will I allow myself to be found in any such counsel, help, applause, action, or deed, by which they may lose their lives or limbs, or be wickedly imprisoned. The counsel which they shall reveal to me myself, or by letters or messengers, I will not knowingly reveal to anyone to their harm. If, however, I should receive news or knowledge of anything that might be a danger to the Roman Pontiff or the Roman Church, or cause it great harm, I will do my utmost to prevent it. And if I cannot prevent it, then I will be faithful to see that our Lord Pope receives news of it. I will help to ensure that the Roman papacy and the regalia of St. Peter, and the rights of his church in particular, 1) if it has such in the church, in the city, or in the country from which I am born, are defended, maintained, and restored against all men. I will faithfully exercise the office of notary public; I will faithfully execute the contracts for which the consent of the contracting parties is required; I will not do anything in addition to this, nor will I do anything about this, that is to say, I will not do anything about this, that is to say, I will not do anything about this.

1) Note in the margin of the Latin edition: This oath, in addition to the other abominations that it has in common with the previous one, contains two new ones that are peculiar to it. The first is that he must swear in particular against his fatherland, which is a great impiety. The other is that, when the papacy or other vain things of the papacy are lost, he mentions the restoration of them, which is an incredible obstinacy against Christ and his word. For he alone wants to put an end to the papacy by his word and deed.

I do not want to change the essentials of the contract. If, however, the will of one part alone should be required for the execution of an instrument, I will execute the same; but such a contract, of which I know that something unlawful or fraudulent occurs therein, I will not execute. I will enter the contracts in the minutes, and when I have entered them, I will not maliciously delay, against the will of those who will be interested in setting up a public instrument about it, without prejudice to my ordinary fees. So help me God, and this his holy gospel.

The old oath of the bishops follows, and is written in Oeorstaidus æe furchurunão 6th LZö.

I, N., bishop, will henceforth be faithful to St. Peter and the holy apostolic Roman church, and to my lord N., pope, as well as to his canonically elected successors. I will not be found in any such counsel, action, or deed, by which he may lose his life, or limb, or be taken captive in a wicked manner. His counsel, which he will make known to me either himself, or by letters, or by a messenger, I will not reveal to anyone to his detriment. I will help to ensure that the papacy of the Roman Church and the rules of the holy fathers are defended and maintained (but without harm to my order) against all men. If I am called to a synod, I will appear if I am not prevented by a hindrance permitted by canon law. To the envoys of the apostolic see, if I know for certain that one is such, I will do all honor in their journeys to and fro, and help them in their needs. I will visit the borders of the apostles every year either in my own person or through a certain deputy, unless I receive a dispensation in this. So help me God, and this his holy Gospel. 2)

2) Marginal note in the Latin edition: This oath formula also largely agrees with the first; and has a special clause of annual visitation of the borders of the apostles. Look for the understanding of this in the next oath formula.

Seeing that the doctors were forced to take such a terrible oath, I began to doubt whether the pope was satisfied at the present time with the oath taken by the bishops. This doubt of mine grew stronger as I read the gloss on the words: LiiiZnUs ruinis inäioto, E. NZo, where it was written: or more rarely, according to his handwriting. Therefore I looked into the korckikioinle and Hdruni esrsmoiiiarlim, where I certainly perceived that they were swearing according to the pope's prescription, but whose content was nevertheless not expressed in either of them. For this reason I asked pious and learned friends, even among foreign nations, to provide me with a credible copy of such a law. Which was done. But this I have found it good to append here from word to word.

The new oath of the bishops follows.

In the name of God, amen. I, N., elected Bishop N., will henceforth be faithful and obedient to St. Peter and the holy apostolic Roman Church, and to our Lord, Lord Hadriano the Sixth, Pope, as well as to his canonically elected successors. I will not be found in any such counsel, applause, action, or deed, by which they may lose life or limb, or be imprisoned, or have any violent hand laid upon them in any manner whatsoever, or be subjected to any injustice whatsoever, under any pretense whatsoever. But the advice and counsel which they will entrust to me, either themselves or by messengers or by letters, I will, to their detriment, reveal to no one with my knowledge. I will help them to preserve and protect the Roman papacy and the regalia of St. Peter against all men. I will show all honor to the envoy of the apostolic see on his journey back and forth, and assist him in his needs. The rights, honor, privileges, and authority of the Roman Church, of our Lord the Pope, and of his aforementioned successors, I will endeavor to preserve, defend, increase, and promote. I will not allow myself to be found in such a council, act or treatise, in which against our Lord himself, or against the said Roman Church, something adverse, or detrimental to persons, to her

If I learn that such a thing is being done or arranged by anyone, I will do my utmost to prevent it, and as soon as possible I will report it to our Lord, or to anyone else who can bring it to his attention. The rules of the holy fathers, decrees, ordinances, pronouncements, dispositions, reservations, events, and apostolic commands I will observe to the best of my ability, and I will urge others to observe them. The heretics, schismatics, and recalcitrants against our Lord or his foregoing successors I will persecute to the best of my ability and fight against them. If I am called to the synod, I will come, unless I am prevented from doing so by an obstacle permitted by the canon law. If the Roman court is on this side of the Alpine mountains, I will visit the borders of the apostles every year; but if it is on the other side of the Alpine mountains, I will visit them once every three years, either in person or through my deputy, unless the apostolic see dispenses me from doing so. The goods belonging to my table, however, I will not sell, nor give away, nor pledge, nor enfeoff anyone with them, nor dispose of them in any way, not even with the approval of the chapter of my church, without the prior knowledge of the Roman Pontiff. So help me God, and this his holy Gospel.

You see, Christian reader, that this oath of the bishops is even harsher and more atrocious than the oath of the doctors. Therefore it is no wonder that learned and prudent canons refuse a bishopric, even if it is offered to them of their own free will, or, if they accept it, after taking this oath, become beasts altogether. For how much is still lacking in the sin against the Holy Spirit, if one is nevertheless not unaware of the papal abominations, and yet he has no hesitation in taking such an oath with knowledge and deliberation?

But this oath (especially) contains the incomparable article of visiting the borders of the apostles, which first of all has its use in this, that if the bishops live too long, and thus prevent too long that the pallia are solved more often, one can grant them the dispensation of the bishops from the apostles.

so that they may either die on the journey, or be put out of the way with poison at Rome, or, if they do not come, then be deposed as perjurers.

First, they shall have the liberty to refrain from such journeys, on payment of an annual sum of money, so long as it shall seem convenient to those at the Roman court. And in order that they should not give anything certain for this freedom once and for all, but should pay a fine every year anew, they shall be permitted to visit the borders of the apostles through deputies. Afterwards, the boys at the court of Rome will find out everything they want to know about them, especially the best prebendaries, so that the pope, when they become open, can give them to his stable boys.

Finally, and most grievously, by this oath all bishops are deceived, imprisoned, and ensnared, and under the Antichrist, the most abominable tyrant of all, are drawn into the heaviest and such slavery that they cannot extricate themselves from it. For no bishop can fulfill this article, in that either important business, or weakness of body, or danger on account of travel and war, detain him. Therefore a bishop is compelled to seek remission of the oath from the pope. If he does so, he confesses, not only in word, but also in deed, that the pope has the power to issue all oaths. But this the Roman bishop eagerly seizes upon, when he has thought out this article to the end. And if afterwards a bishop contradicts the Roman tyranny by which he is oppressed, and wishes to set its end and measure, he is banished and deposed, and his subjects are absolved from the oaths of their obedience.

Furthermore, if a bishop asserts that his subjects cannot justifiably be absolved from the oath of their obedience, he contradicts himself, and makes himself a perjurer, as he himself also believed that he could be absolved from the obligation of his oath by the pope, and he also asked for it. And relying on this acquittal, he has broken his oath with knowledge and good deliberation. But if he were to pretend ignorance, it would follow that he would still be required to visit the apostles annually. If he does so, he will meet his certain death.

From this it now follows that I repeat everything briefly together: whoever invokes this Clausel is compelled to submit to the Papal tyranny and courageous will in all, even the most unjust and insufferable

If his subjects are disenrolled from obedience by the pope, he must lose his bishopric, or run the risk of committing perjury, and thereby render himself unfit for the bishopric; or, if he keeps the oath, present himself to the cruelest tyrant for an ignominious death penalty. O, are not these more than devilish deceits? O, are not these womanish bishops, who have suffered so cruel a tyranny for so many years, in so slavish a manner? They would rather have endured a thousand deaths than have so shamefully abandoned the church and left it to the Antichrist to destroy and oppress.

From this, then, the Christian reader should consider for himself what good one should hope from a papal concilio, in which such doctors will debate, in which such notaries will draw up public acts, and such bishops and cardinals will write the final judgments. For apart from such persons no one is admitted to a concilio, as is clearly written in the book of papal ceremonies in these words: "We do not read that anyone came to the conciliiis, when something was to be concluded and agreed upon, except bishops and elders, and these alone signed the conclusions. Bishops, however, are also called the most distinguished among the bishops, for this is the highest office and authority in the Church of God. But the ecclesiastics of lower rank, and the secular princes, were only present for the reason that they gave good counsel and instruction, but not that they made a pronouncement, since, as the jurists say, they have at the Conciliiis voosrn oonsultivurn, not (IstirülivnIN, but äsliBsrutivrn, that is, they only give good counsel, and help to consider the matter, but make no conclusion with their voice."

Accordingly, at the Conciliiis, to make a conclusion, will appear: the Roman Pontiff, as the head and governor of the whole Church, the shepherd of the Lord's host and bishop over all the bishops, the holy College of Cardinals, the patriarchs, the primates, archbishops, bishops, and abbots, to whom are also not unreasonably added the Untres Ksnernlss of the orders; Finally, all prelates who are required to come to the synod by virtue of the oath which they must take when they are promoted to their offices. Others, however, as I have said, may be present to give their opinion. They may be present to give instruction and good counsel, but they will not sit in the public sessions in their holy robes, nor will they speak.

1245 King Henry VIII's concerns in England and France, and of the whole realm of England, about the Mantuan Concilio which had been invented, written out and then postponed.

Pauli, the Roman bishop. Anno 1538.

The two following documents first came out separately in quarto in 1538 (von der Hardt, autoK. Dutü., Mrt. II, p. 213), then in Hortleder, torn. I, lib. I, eap. 30. 31, x>. 111.

(1) Since all the world is well aware that we have lain in this, that the holy Scriptures alone have been restored to their honor and dignity, we take it for granted that it is not only proper and due to us to restore the Christian religion, to use all diligence, but also to counter the cunning attempts of the bishops of Rome, who have not neglected any time to confuse the truth. To this we are driven by the love we bear for the truth, and the protection of religion, which we have long since accepted for ourselves here.

002 Forasmuch then as the Roman bishop Paul, in all places, for a great reward, doth set up learned men to suppress the truth, and maketh every man a cardinal, from whom he thinketh he hath comfort and help: we have been troubled, and have often thought what such a setting up of all things, and ordering of men, might mean? And what it is, we have guessed. Namely, since we are well accustomed to the popes' deceit and warfare, we could easily assume that a council of those who are attached to the pope and are his friends (which they, however erroneously, call a general, common council) would exist in the future before a council was thought of or mentioned.

3rd And what shall I say much? At last, when all things were prepared for deceit, a concilium is proclaimed, to which no Christian king could come, or even a little (as Pope Paul well knew), because the time when it should begin, and the place where it should be held, made it certain and sure that no king would come thither. The bull must have come to all places, and required all kings to do it, boldly enough for the kings to take upon themselves all the causes of deceit, and to promote the imaginary Concilium. For who knows not that Paulo and his Cardinals have never been in earnest to hold a General Concilium? Who is less desirous of a public, common assembly of Christians, than those who despair of their own affairs, unless they be judges, and pronounce a sentence upon their own opponents?

004 We indeed, because we are hardly required by our kingdom and government, cannot come to this council, nor send our embassy there for the sake of our affairs, and yet we do not want to be suspected of accusing ourselves. For who can accuse us of not appearing at the request of one who has no authority or right to demand us? And we suppose that he has power and right, and that no one can admit him, except he who is unlearned in the Scriptures: for what use is it to go to such a council, since no one has room and place, except he who condemns the truth and defends lies? Every man can see with what respectability, faith, and godliness they interpret the erroneous and controversial articles, which now in these perilous times they have promised to dispute.

005 Now that they have chosen Mantua for this council, it is evident that Christianity may not expect any benefit or piety from it. For what Christian prince outside of Italy, or even a whale himself, who does not immediately agree with the pope, may come there? for no one goes there who may give his voice to the suppressed truth, for that would be giving up his life. Thus it would be no wonder that the pope's patrons (since the pope is the judge, since no one may strive or speak against him) would obtain that the pope's prestige and power, which have long since fallen and almost perished, would again be established and replaced in such a council. Does this mean to counsel and help the afflicted hearts, the confused religion, and the shattered truth? And you, Pope Paule, or any of your own, have you ever dreamed (if in this way it should befit you to pronounce judgment in the erroneous and controversial articles, without any plea of your opposition) of advising and helping the church error or the spiritual infirmities which have crept into the church, by other ways than by false Concilia? It is verily to be believed, because ye seek nothing but your own profit, that ye will not willingly drop or make obsolete what your forefathers, some hundred years ago, have ordained and set against Christ and the holy Scriptures, for their own profit. For as often as one has wanted to act from their position, advantage, honor, authority, and primacy, they have always wanted to counsel and help them by suppressing divine commandments, by wickedness of their honor, and that I may rightly say, their unpleasant hope. Is it not yet certain that you are not naughty children, following in the footsteps of your fathers, and making new friends?

What is the matter with us, what you have done before, or what you will do hereafter, since England has given you leave and leave forever? But what is it to us what you have set before, or what you will set hereafter, since England has long since given you leave and the last forever? The pope has nothing to do nor to do with England, he shall certainly do no more to us, nor shower us with his goods or merchandise. But what he shall command or forbid, that we will not accept at all, and indeed nothing more, than what every bishop sets or gives.

006 And lest we be counted among the righteous, as if we were moved by the will and pleasure of our hearts, and not by reason with right understanding, we will bear witness before all the world, that we confess and accept the right faith, the Christian doctrine, and all that may adorn or promote it, and will confess it for ever. The whole Christian doctrine is so dear to our hearts that we would much rather put our kingdom in danger than let some article of the Christian faith suffer danger. We testify that we have not departed from the Christian faith, nor do we ever wish to depart from it, and would rather die before one article of this Christian faith should fall or perish among the English. And we testify to ourselves, since we regard nothing but Christ's honor and the world's benefit and peace, that we can no longer suffer their deceitfulness, and have been moved for several reasons to refuse and reject the Pope's authority, Sentence, Decreta, and Concilia.

(7) Finally, we testify that we have not refused to appear hereafter at a common, public, Christian assembly. Even now we promise and pledge all our diligence, effort, fidelity, and faith, that the broken religion may be restored to its dignity and state, and also that other discord, which for a time has troubled the world, may be changed; but we diligently remind all Christians that we can no longer suffer them to be thought to purge out and abolish all error, who are diligent that no one may overthrow error when he loses his neck.

008 We want to hold a council, we desire it and ask for it, but such a council as is proper and fitting to be held among Christians. Namely, a free one, in which each one may fearlessly speak the truth. A common one, in the place and time where any who seek Christ's honor may appear without danger and speak his mind freely. Then it may be considered a common council, if none of the Christians who are at variance with the pope may remain outside, or if those who are present are not deterred from saying freely and without all timidity what they think is right. For who is it (the pope, cardinals, and some papal bishops excepted) who would not gladly come to such a council? And again, who would be so foolish as to come thither, who would see the pope's things act almost alone, and in a concilio the pope rule and reign as a single judge? Yea, he that can defend his cause nowhere before any judge but himself? who doth much rather execute ungodly errors, than decide strife and contention? What canst thou devise in Christendom more pernicious than common concilia?

009 And that I should say of their offence, Whence hath the pope power and right to require the kings to a concilio? And since in time past all concilia were held by the consent and command of emperors, kings, and princes, would it not be fair that it should be done even now? or that you should show cause why it should not be done? You say it is more probable that the popes will embrace the Christian religion more than the kings. But the world has seen, with great harm to Christendom, how faithfully and diligently the popes do this thing. We all see how honestly Pope Paul takes cause to defend his tyranny. We see the time that the holy man has chosen for a concilio.

(10) Can it be believed that he was in earnest to reestablish religion at a time when the emperor and the king of France, the two most powerful princes, are so embittered with wars against each other that neither they nor any Christian king have room or place for a council? Now then, Pabst, the cause which thou and thine so fervently desired many years ago is come. Now that it is come, suppress it, or use it in vice and deceit. Call to thee the cardinals, thy creatures, and show them that now in due time a strange thing hath happened, to ape and fool the princes and the Christian people. O fools! (that we hate to say) and ye desperate

Peel! (You have long been suspected by princes and the Christian people that you can suffer nothing less, and that you would much rather pray for anything than a Christian concilium, even though you pretend to be much different and are hypocritical in all things. Shall you also be so foolish, that you shall publicly declare, that you intend nothing with your Conciliabulo or Rotterei, but to cut off the Christians their hope, which they carry to a free, common, Christian Concilio? Have you then such a hatred against the truth that you do not cease from your presumption, unless it be cast out into a little misery? God still lives, and because he lives, the truth shall never again come to such shame, scorn, dishonor, and injustice.

011 Whom shall it not grieve that men are so impudent in the sight of Christ? Again, who would not rejoice greatly that they are at the same time so foolish in their ungodly nature? The world, Pabst Paule, has not so little suspicion now as it had before. Yes, it sees your deceit before its eyes, and it condemns your unquenchable hatred of truth. They all see well what tumult is introduced into Christendom from your pretended appearance of concord and unity. They perceive that your endeavors to make peace are nothing else than to stir up turmoil against the common good of peace. They see that you never attack the truth more fiercely than when you pretend to defend it. It grieves them that such wise men have so long suffered your hidden deceit. It grieves them that reason has given all its power to help wickedness, hope, and idolatry. It grieves them that virtue has served vices, a holy life hypocrisy, prudence guile, and justice tyranny with such diligence. They rejoice that God now does not oppose God, that Christ does not oppose Christ. They rejoice that in time past guile did not do so great violence to the truth as it now does, that hereafter iniquity against religion may do no more than constancy for the truth. They see that all conciliation is for the common good, that you have sought your own profit by suppressing the truth, and would much rather let the gospel perish than let something of your honor and dignity, that is, of your impudent iniquity, fall.

012 And verily Pope Paul doeth nothing else at this day, because he, as the princes are with
If a more convenient time and city should arise for him to act on religion, and he did not wish to come to it, he would deem it just to repay him in kind for not coming to it, because the kings do not now come to his council.

13. May God grant that we do not forever quarrel and bicker among ourselves with such insults, nor, when we are most vehemently divided, may we each boast on his own side that he has the best cause. May God grant that the immovable and confirmed truth may break the only pretensions of the deceivers. May God grant that once there is peace in the world, there will be time and time to act on the Christian religion. Unless the kings are at one among themselves, let go of the wars, and seek peace, we do not see what good it would do to set up a council, even if it is most desired, because effort and labor are lost. Yea, because they are troubled with wars and weapons, and think of nothing else but war, that the pope, nevertheless, should not turn and turn all things to his profit, and confirm all errors, if he were to hold a council in the absence of the kings; and no marvel; because they cannot be there that otherwise would come to it, and do not yield to the pope so much of our rights: would not the pope, for his profit and to manage the errors, arrange and set all things in order?

(14) How can any of us, if he were foolish, not refuse to go to Mantua? where one must travel with great danger, and it is convenient for us to do so, who are surrounded everywhere, O Paule, with your cousins, friends, brothers-in-law, who are related to you by country, by nature, for gain, or elsewhere? Is not he worthy of death that throws himself into the fire alive and sighted? Since your enemy (that is, a heretic, as the heretics say) is at this time putting his life in danger, who travels to Cremon, which is near Mantua, could any of ours be safe in Mantua in that city? How if Mantua were not large enough to accommodate so many guests, when otherwise they all come who belong to one Concilio? How that the way from hence to Mantua is full of danger? Know you not that

Is it the opinion of all laws that no man may travel by uncertain ways to a concilio? What, that he hath not hitherto obtained for us a safe conduct to travel now and then from those under whose power the cities lie? And even if he had obtained it, we should be presumptuous to set out on such a perilous journey ourselves (for we may and ought to be justly afraid). For indeed, as things now stand, he that travels from England to Mantua cannot be safe, for he would be foolish. It is evident that the popes have never held no faith in such matters. How often have they perished by the pope's cunning, deceit, and malice, who have journeyed with a safe conduct to a council? It is not new that the popes are faithless and do not keep their promise, but have defiled their hands in the innocent blood of pious people, contrary to their oath.

015 But we dwell too long on that which is common to us with other nations; we will speak no longer of it, but only say more of it, which shall especially move the king of England, all Englishmen. Is there anyone who does not know that Pope Paul is a servant of the king, and secretly seeks his life with all cunning, [because] he has cast out the tyrant? Likewise he seeketh to destroy the bishops and nobles, by whose diligence and counsel he is cast out. Who does not see that the pope is so completely inflamed with hatred, and that he can no longer hold his impetuous anger, nor can he longer contain his malice? He is a public enemy, do not hide it; he moves everyone against the king, and strengthens them to destroy the kingdom. All this year he hath provoked the English to rebellion with money and proffered honours. We will not say how with greater diligence and equal malice he hath subdued himself to incite the Christian princes against us. Without doubt, the governor of Christ proves by his life how he understands what Christ has said. He thinks that he is a governor of Christ, because it behooves him to say, "I am not come to send peace, but the sword," not that Christ would want his Christians to be armed, but that the cruel murderers should abuse to the death the blood of their neighbor. We are almost astonished that they often rage against others, because they show and prove us, who have received no small benefit from us, scorn and derision in return for gratitude, and violence with all their diligence in return for a good deed. We have no desire to recount here how many benefits we have shown to the popes.

are lost. They may go, the ungrateful people; they are not worthy to be called men, or to be called men; and verily such men, that one knoweth not whether God or men should hate them more fiercely, when we had not learnt to be kind even to our enemies. What evil shall we wish them, that we should not be esteemed for it, that we should wish too little for their wickedness shown to us? But this we wish for them, that God may give them a better mind.

016 Thanks be to God, we have brought to nought their rebelliousness, but so that we will beware of the enemy for ever: for though they be at enmity with us, we will not forsake the host, lest they tear the bloodthirsty wolves. Yea, all the holy list, because they do no harm to any but the deceivers themselves. Do harm, disappear, and indicate how they grudge us evil, and with great eagerness would like to harm us. But the enemy that is known can harm no one but a fool or an imprudent man. The judgment of Clem entis the Seventh and Paul the Third, which we have despised, remains and abides in our hearts. They are concerned that, if we escape without harm and punishment, the other princes of Christendom will no longer tolerate or suffer the Pope's power and authority, which is unjust. It grieves them that the way in England should be closed to their tyranny, their pride, and their avarice. They grieve that our ancestors' privilege, that is, the power to charm and rob our citizens, even ourselves, is taken from them. They think it is unreasonable that we want to demand cheap things from them, who do not want to be subject to any law. They think we do them injustice when we do not permit them to do injustice to other people. They can see that, since the indulgence fair has fallen, they have lost a large sum of gold. They can sell no more bulls. And no wonder, for England is come to her senses. Everybody knows that they do foolishly who give gold for lead, although St. Peter's and St. Paul's faces stand up to a fraud. It grieveth every man that they are so wicked and bold, and use the face of the saints for their own profit. Truly, if God would be ungracious to us and take away our reason and understanding, then the pope in England shall not only have no more authority or prestige, but also in a short time he shall no longer be remembered. Certainly he shall exercise his power against us and our citizens...

no longer use. Let us seek counsel from him, if we err, be deceived, and be deceived; whether thou canst expect anything else from him (because it may be supposed from the deceitfully laid foundation that the whole building must be deceitful), but that they will see the Christians, torture and burn them, and pervert the truth, yea, utterly destroy it? If anything else be ordered in the Mantuan assembly, remember with us that this is no small praise of the popes, that they always abuse the appearance of respectability for the extermination of respectability; if it please them, they will be seen to have indulged us a little, and yet are never more to be feared, than if they live to please us; They will be deceived, and will yield some of their doctrine; they will also moderate and drop some abuses; and even so, if they suffer such things to be done, they will require much greater and more grievous things of us. It cannot well happen that thou canst be sufficiently ware of them. Let whoever wants to go to the cunning and deceitful fair, we will not give in to our right; we will not come ourselves, nor send any of our people there.

(17) So far we have spoken of this matter as if the Concilium were going on in Mantua. Now we want to say a little about the Bulla, which the Concilium has scattered on the first of November, unnamed some Malstatt.

(18) It is to be believed that the Concilium will not be held anywhere, if the pope does not find a place where his relatives can go and attend, and that no decrees against the Christian religion will be made in it. It has happened as if God loved the pope and his own, and it is well that the Mantuan Concilium has been postponed to another time. Why then? For what reason, since there are now in the city of Mantua those who think that your will must be obeyed? Why, Paule, dost thou not keep thy promise? Why do you not assemble a council?

019 The Bulla answereth us well: We hear that Duke Frederick of Mantua, when he gave us answer, made himself hard for it, and said that there should be a great host and money for the pay of it; and the same is no other thing than that he hath denied us his city to the Concilio. What should great lords be at heart, if this great dishonour move not all their minds, nor make them bitter nor angry? Dost thou not mock and despise the emperor and the other kings of the world, that thou shouldest have made them angry with their great aftermath?

Do you call for a concilium in a city where you yourself are not allowed to hold a concilium? If kings have ever been mocked, thou mockest them, that thou summonest them, whither thou mayest not come, or that thou scatterest the concilium, and callest no place. If they had obeyed thee, and come to Mantua, whither thou hadst demanded them all, they would have returned home with scorn and derision.

020 Thou hast cause why thou shouldest accuse the princes, if they appear not afterward at thy demand, seeing thou now demandest them, and laughest at them so shamefully, and mockest them. Let it be that they all know thee for their lord to be obedient unto thee: would it not be fearful that they would depart from obedience, if thou wouldst so abuse thy power against them? Now that they are not to obey thee in any way, and that thou art commanded to obey not only the king, as the chief, but all his captains in order and command, how canst thou wonder that the kings afterward should be at thy will, whom thou so openly apeest and dissemble? Who ever was so impudent, bold, and insolent, as to require the kings to a concilio, and not to show a certain place there to counsel? But Pope Paul requires the kings to a concilio: whither? Nowhere. Is not this to ape and to deceive the kings, what then is to ape and to deceive?

(21) But at last he remembereth "how much he hath ravished them all, or laughed them to scorn, and mocked them," and pretendeth to be sorry. Truly, yes, it is a great art to him to pretend to be sorry, who can pretend to all things. He says he had hoped, but was deceived, that the Duke of Mantua would willingly and gladly have permitted his city of Mantua to a Concilio; now the Duke would not do it, for he would be sufficiently supplied with footmen and pay to maintain them. Therefore the pope is concerned that some may have set out on their journey to Mantua at his request, and that they will have to return home with their great loss. And so that all men may hear how the popes have nothing to fear, he says: "Such great injustices, done to all the world, because it is not his fault but someone else's, he must tolerate and bear all the more easily."

022 So is it not enough that thou mockest and revileth the absent ones; thou then troubleest Duke Frederick of Mantua also with thy fault? What wrong hath he done, that he hath brought so great a multitude of people without an addition of soldiers?

will not take him into his city? But thou banishest thy brethren and thy children, the patriarchs, the archbishops, the abbots, and others, the prelates of the churches and monasteries, that they come not into the place where they cannot be. Are then the shot arrows of thy thunderbolts, according to thy pleasure, as often as it pleaseth thee, [revoked by thee]? But thou mayest well excuse thyself, and easily discharge all blame, because thou sayest it is not fair, but a wicked example, to hold a concilium with men of war. Is not this a fine thing, well papal? If you do not order the duke's protection, he will not trust his city to you and yours; but if you order the men of war there, no one will come there except those who are bound to you by oaths; you will easily give away the lists, so that all the world will suspect you beforehand of not wanting to hold a general council.

023 Thou wilt have them all present with thee on the first day of November, and thou knowest not yet where thou wilt be. But what is the matter where thou dost bid us go, since it is the same thing: to be nowhere, and to be in the place where the council cannot be held. No city will serve thee as well as any city, because thou hast determined not to hold a council anywhere. Indeed, it is more useful to you, because you do not want to be there, not to appoint a city, but to indicate a certain place; you can also easily free your faith if you promise nothing. It is a great honor to the pope that he has not more than once mocked and made fun of the princes. And certainly, if he shall at last set up a place, there is no doubt that he will give us one in his cities (though they are not his, but are respected and held for his alone), which his ancestors brought to themselves by force and cunning, and which, contrary to law and all equity, he possesses and has with an evil conscience, (And if he shall demand that the right heirs thereof be driven out and cast out, and have them by force), or in another prince, subject to the kingdom, thither no man that is otherwise in reason and at variance with the pope shall go, and (if he shall demand us thither) thither he himself cannot, except he have an army with him. Would not these be great fools, who, having once been mocked or driven about, would at another time be led about and deceived? Is it not true that we are deceived, when we believe him that promised us, which, though he would, he cannot keep? Now he will not, though he might.

24. But we dwell too long on things,

...which are no concern of ours. For let him choose a city which he wills, which is safe, where every man may come without fear or danger, and we will never come to a council to which he calls us. Yes, we want to publicly declare to Pope Paul and his followers, which we have often said before, that they have no right nor authority in England; we do not give them any, nor do we want to grant them any, and all that they have valued and demanded from us before by force and cunning, we want to demand again by right, and by good right. We have in time past given you the primacy. If now your power over us has had a beginning with our consent, it shall now also have an end with our consent. Since we have given it, why should we not have taken it away again? In former times we wrote that we were less than the popes; and as long as we allowed ourselves to think that we were less, we were justly obedient to them. But now we write much differently. Therefore, if we are not obedient to their decrees and commandments, they have no reason to be very astonished; temporal and divine rights are for us. A freeman does not forsake his liberty, and even if one writes himself a servant, he has not violated the cause of his liberty. If they wish to impose custom upon us, let them answer Cypriano: Where the truth is not in the habit, the habit is nothing but an old error. What is it that Christ says, "I am the way, the life, and the truth?" He never said, "I am the habit. Will you quarrel with us, that you have custom for yourselves, and we have the Scriptures for us? How often doth Christ exhort you (if ye be otherwise his disciples, who are wiser than your Doctor, Christ, that ye reject his laws, and lift up your own traditions), that your one should not be chief, nor exalt and exalt himself above the other 2c. But in this public and bright matter we will no longer persist.

(25) By the command of the emperor and the Christian princes, we desire and wish for a safe and free council, so that truth and religion may be advised, which are no more oppressed by any other thing than by the conciliation of the Roman bishops, and even by rites. Now lately errors, abuses, and idolatries have increased unseemly. Therefore, be wise in the end, you princes who rule the world, and think out counsel and help against so many pestilences and errors of the sick church. For all wise men despair of a general council. We respect-that it is best, however, because we rather desire a concilium than hope that each one will eradicate the errors in his kingdom by his commands. We have communicated this counsel of ours to all, and if we have given good counsel, we take it for granted that there is no need of an admonisher to require them to do so. I have a good hope that any king will help the kings' majesty, which is now exactly completed again, so that they will no longer raise wolves, and if they want to hear us, they will not subscribe to the popes' cunning suggestions. O princes, help the work begun! Your honor, dignity, and majesty have returned to their rightful place; remember that this one thing is most proper and due to your office, that you help and assist the truth and the Christian religion. Beware that the cunning of the enemy is no more powerful than your might; help us to wage an eternal war against the vices of the popes.

026 Be obedient to their decrees, inasmuch as now at Mantua, at this or any other council, they establish, ordain, or command anything that will help the Christian faith and declare the truth; this accept willingly, not for the sake of the pope and his cardinals, but that the Christian faith and the truth may be given such honor for good. The truth, and that which is honest, we gladly learn, even from a heathen; and in like manner, as we gladly will admit all things that shall be useful and serviceable to the Christian faith, so again, if they shall ordain, establish, or command any thing to the detriment of the truth, to the advancement of its primacy, and to confirm its power, or that the right, authority, and majesty of kings shall be diminished, insulted, or weakened, so we hereby proclaim to all the world that we have not accepted it, nor ever will accept it.

27 Therefore, you believers in Christ of the whole world have heard what we wanted to write about the general council; we also believe that it is known and evident to you that the pope, bishop, and cardinal do not desire a council for the sake of truth, but rather that truth and Christ may be suppressed. You understand that at this time it is not convenient to hold a council, that even Mantua, the city, is not convenient for it, indeed no city anywhere; you see that there is even a small hope of a general council. You see how you are admonished in what way every prince should restore peace to the broken and divided religion. If anyone among you knows a better counsel, we will gladly follow it, and especially concerning religion. We do not want to use our advice if someone better will advise us. May God Almighty increase the desire of our hearts to pour out the same advice that He has given us according to His goodness, or a better one, not only in us, but also in all people. To him be glory and praise at all times, amen.

1246 Henry VIII, King of England and France, 2c., writing to the Emperor's Majesty, to all other Christian kings and potentates, in which the King shows cause why he will not come to Vicenza to the Concilio (which is called with a false title general), and how dangerous it is for all others who have accepted the Gospel of Christ to appear there. London, April 8, 1539.

Translated from the Latin by Justus Jonas.

By the Grace of GOD, Henry the Eighth, King in England and France 2c., the Roman Emperor, all Kings, Princes, and all Christians 2c.

1. The other day a book was written and published in our name and in the name of all our subjects, in which sufficient and superfluous reasons were given why we rejected the concilium which the Roman bishop, boasting and pretending to his stolen and usurped power (which is neither commanded to him by God nor to be suffered any longer by other rulers), invented: first, as if it were to be held in Mantua; then, without expressing any place or certain place, he extended his favor to Oalsnae. Uovsmbris, as he has thereby sufficiently given to understand that all that would be decided in the same concilio and assembly of the people, who are all of one opinion and sworn into one sect, or also in any such synod, which the Roman bishop sets up by his false, arrogant, supposed power, may not bring harm or damage to our things.

(2) And we have deemed it unnecessary to protest so often anew with new work, and to refuse the Concilium, as often as the Roman bishop, and those whose art and understanding he always needs to adorn his deceit, invent their own way to ape the people by Romanist pieces.

(3) However, if at this time, due to both change of place and location, and also for other reasons, some misgivings have occurred to us, which it may be useful for all the world to know and hear, we have considered that we have not acted inappropriately to the inclination and love which we bear towards the Christian religion and faith, if by this writing of ours, as by an addition, we have confirmed our previous opinion and refusal of the Concilii.

4. And we want to confirm the same herewith, but still protest that we have let the reported book and its attached preface go out with the opinion that we are not as eager as any other Christian princes and potentates for a public common council, or that we do not want to appear willingly and gladly; For we hereby most diligently exhort and request all Christian princes and potentates, all cities of Christendom, that they will certainly consider it that we desire nothing more than that such a council may finally be held, which may truly be called a common, general, free, Christian council, as we have to some extent drafted in our previous protestation of the council at Mantua.

005 For verily, as our forefathers invented nothing more holy, more Christian, than that in important matters the Christian estates should thus come together, especially if the Concilia were so held, and finally directed, as it was meant at first: so also there is nothing that brings greater danger, more terrible harm, to Christendom, to the faith, to religion, than the Concilia, when they are misused for avarice, vain honour, self-interest, and confirmation of all errors.

(6) The concilia are called general and common from the beginning, and this word of his is sufficient that not only the bishops or the like, but all Christians who are in doubt about an article among themselves, may publicly, freely, and without all danger and fear, express their doubts and opinions. For if what is decided in a common council affects all those by whose consent it is done, it is also proper that every one whom it affects should speak his mind freely, without fear or hindrance.

007 And there is no doubt that such a council cannot or may not be called general, since only those are heard who have resolved among themselves to applaud the pope at all times, and by the pope also to hold publicly against the holy scriptures.

(8) It cannot be a general council, nor can it be called one, since the Pope's part is both advocate and adversary, both plaintiff and judge. Yes, it is contrary to all reason, contrary to all natural rights, that we should suffer ourselves to be burdened with such an unjust law and burden; if we were deprived of all protection and salvation, there would be no refuge or consolation left for us to flee to, if we were offended and afflicted to the highest degree by the pope. The pope and his followers are all ours, and would gladly destroy us and our kingdom to the ground and turn back, of which we have much public evidence, and which is before the eyes of almost the whole world.

009 Therefore we have done wrong to all reason and nature, if we have given authority to men alone to judge us. His, the pope's, honor and glory are first sought by false worship, by unrighteous violence and tyranny, and vain deceit, wicked trickery, and deceitfulness; his majesty is introduced by deceitful pretense of a spiritual appearance against God, against the old true religion, against the holy Scriptures, and thus established by and by. His primacy, that he alone wants to be the most superior before all our bishops and churches, has come to the time when all the world was ignorant, through the ambition of bishops and church shepherds, through ignorance and misunderstanding of some necessary sayings of the holy scriptures. All this, when the mists and vapors of such errors have been dispelled by the sun and light of the gospel, has not only fallen among us and in our countries, but it is to be expected that it will soon perish and fall everywhere.

010 But would not all these things be restored? Would not his majesty and honor be fully restored to him? Would not such papal Roman power, which has neither measure nor end, trouble great kings, all potentates? Would not the primacy everywhere want to have dominion? if such a wholly suspicious judge would or should take from our hands such a well-founded, public honor, divine and good cause, of his own bad will and pleasure. There is truly no one without wit or completely blind who cannot soon realize here what the outcome and end would be of this most important, most necessary matter of religion, of which all high disputations are, if such a bitter, harmful, public enemy of all truth were to pass judgment on it.

011 Wherefore, if it be once possible, and ever possible to obtain, let it be and be not.

We are holding such a council in the hope that the necessary things and articles may be reformed and made right, which are erroneous and have been perverted by the pope; without which reformation the whole Christian religion may finally perish.

12. As we heartily desire such a free, Christian council, and consider that every one should seek and ask for it through diligent prayer: Therefore, we consider that it is our royal office to prevent and avoid with all diligence that such cunning and various frauds of the Roman popes may not be detrimental to any of our subjects, and also to diligently warn and admonish the other Christian princes and potentates, that the pope of kings, princes, and great lords may not abuse his power to eradicate the beloved root of the implanted gospel, that he may not deprive the princes of their authority, the kings of their majesty and majesty, according to his pleasure.

(13) We have no doubt that any God-fearing, reverent reader will easily like what he reads in the following book, which we have not only written and sent out on our account, but that all the world may hear of the great infidelity, cunning, and deceit of the papists, and also understand how highly we desire and wish that the discord in the matter of religion may come to a good, blessed end. What was said about Mantua at the time when the local council was appointed may well be written and said about Vicentia now, for it all fits together. And it is not believable that more suitable persons should come together in Vicenza to speak of the great things of the Christian faith than were in Mantua last year. He is truly mocked and ridiculed who has been deceived twice, and has been deceived out of unfaithfulness, and comes back the third time. After some have first hurried to Mantua and only learned halfway that nothing would come of it, so that they had to turn back, we take care that they will not soon be so foolish again, if they have once traveled such a long way in vain, that they will again set out on the journey, or again let themselves be ridiculed. Such is the speed and all the hardships of the present time, and of all things, that the religious trade should be harmed, except it be done conveniently and easily.

014 Forasmuch as in all the world there are all manner of swift dealings with wars, and also the passage of the Turk. it must be an enemy of religion who would consider this a convenient time to assemble concilia. For, truly, the high and great affairs and matters that we have with and against the pope or bishop at Rome are much, and much more important to be respected than that they can be undertaken in these troubled times, or in our absence, even if it were quiet peace, without great trouble and danger, be ordered to lawyers.

(15) What the other princes and potentates intend to do, we do not really know. We, for our part, do not know at this time how to travel from our kingdom, or how to be absent, nor do we know our most important matters to anyone, except that we are in our own person to command and to trust; and unless other and more convenient judges are set down, also a more convenient place where our cause may be acted upon. If the other things were there, of which we complain, we do not intend to attend such a council; we do not want to make in any way the judge of these things of ours, who before, many years ago, in an unheard matter, had passed judgement against us. We desire and want that this doctrine, which we lead and confess, be heard according to all necessity and held against the holy Scriptures, as the right touchstone. What has not been discussed and considered we will not dismiss; we will not let this matter be suppressed unheard; we will not trample on the truth so publicly, and we will not admit it, suffer it, or tolerate it; and there shall not be one jot or one tittle of Christ's teaching, we will, with God's help, dare to preserve and protect it with our lives and kingdom, and all those who challenge or oppress this blessed doctrine we will eternally consider as our enemies. Just as we have eternally eradicated and abolished in our kingdom all the traditions and statutes of the popes of old, which strengthened their tyranny, exalted and increased their splendor and court, so we, by the grace of Christ, will eternally watch and diligently guard that no new traditions be made by our consent, which might bind us or our kingdom. And is it ever true, where there are men who are not themselves willingly blind, there is no doubt that the Spirit of Christ teaches the godly. And even a heathen can understand by common natural reason how the sovereignty and authority of the pope is not at all established nor to be respected.

(16) Of this also the laudable Prince Frederick, Duke of Mantua, has given a notable example; and as he then had the good right to deny the pope the place and location for the concilium at Mantua, thus to a certain extent offered the pope checkmate 1). But if the pope was serious about holding a council in Mantua, and if he has the right and authority, power and authority to summon the princes wherever he pleases, then why did he not use his high authority here to choose a place that he wants? The pope chose Mantua, but the duke would not allow him to do so. Now if Paul the Third has such authority as he claims, why did he not compel Duke Frederick to grant the concilium at Mantua? The duke has not wished to permit it, and, what is more, he has forbidden no one to be admitted to Mantua. Where are here the thunderbolts of the pope, and terrible commandments and bulls? Why hath he not forced this of Mantua? How is it then that here plsnituão potsstatis and sovereignty sehlschlägt? Does not the pope summon the kings and princes in vain and in vain, if they will not be admitted to the place where he has summoned them?

(17) Will not the kings, princes, and potentates also say that they have good reason and right not to come if the duke of Mantua refuses the place which the pope has chosen? If the other princes and potentates will do likewise with the pope, where will the pope finally find a place for his concilio? Again, if the princes grant the pope this power to assemble the council, they must of necessity also give him leave to choose a place where he cannot use such his power; or shall he thus have power to assemble the council, and yet always be uncertain of the place?

018 Truly the pope is not in the habit of using his own cities much in place of the council. The pious man is so faithful and kind to others that he is not in the habit of accommodating princes in his cities. And if he should require one of us in his cities, how could we be safe under such a great enemy's authority? We would not have much room or time there to deal with religion; we would have to seek how to avoid all sorts of secret treacheries; we could not deal much with articles of Christian doctrine; we would have to take care how to be safe in life.

Nineteen Therefore by this his own That shows,

1) In the old edition: "Schmachmatt".

The pope says enough that he has no sovereignty, power, or authority in places subject to foreign sovereigns; and therefore, if in the future he promises a council in such places, he promises that which is to be held with other people, and will deceive us again. But if he shall call us to him, we know not how to trust the host and his table; we would rather go hungry than dine with the host.

020 But if they say, There is now a place found in Venice, look for no other; as if the like might not be done in Venice, as it was done in Mantua; as if it were not to be believed that the Venetians, being wise, experienced, and highly understanding men, would not also spare and do that which the duke hath done in Mantua. And if we consider the present situation of the Venetians, we cannot believe that they should entrust their city of Vicenza to so many foreign nations without a single army and a goodly garrison, or at such great expense for a long time with an army. And although the Venetians wanted to bear the expenses with provisions and other things, Paul the Third himself confesses that it is an annoyance and a bad example to hold such a council that it is similar to a military camp.

21. Let it now be as it may, we desire, and have also requested of all of you, that you will not complain of reading and considering the proclamation which we made before the council to be assembled at Mantua: We have no doubt that you, as honorable and honest people, will easily applaud us against the adversaries' deceit and fraud, and will note here that in this matter we did not give in too much to our own feelings, did not seek anything self-serving, but for very important and urgent, frugal reasons, we suspiciously refused the concilium, coercion and decision.

022 But that this our letter may please every man and all, we take heed not too hard to urge or to entreat; if that which we have not unreasonably signified here. If what we have indicated here is not unreasonable, it is enough to please those who understand; evil and dangerous people's insults and false claims do not move us or move us only a little.

023 And if it be thought by any that we have written too hard against the ruse and deceit of the pope, let it be thought that we are of the great vices, and that we have not done this out of a bitter and evil spirit.

024 And that the pope and his might ver-that we may not only fight against them, but against their great vice, we pray, and have exhorted all men to earnest prayer, to call upon God, that he may open their eyes, soften the great hardening and hardness of their hearts, that in the end they may also all join with us in promoting the praise and glory of the eternal true God, our Lord JEsu Christ, and forget their own vain glory.

(25) To the Roman Emperor, to all Christian kings, princes and potentates, and to all the people who desire to hear and spread the Gospel of Christ, we wish God's grace, salvation and all good things. Date at London in our palace, 6 läu8 Aprilis [8 April], of our realm in the 39th year.

1247 D. Mart. Luther's writing "of the Conciliis and Churches", in which he shows that the pope only mocks Christianity with the Concilio, which is scheduled here and there and so often postponed again. Completed in the first half of March, published in April 1539.

This writing belongs to the most learned and most carefully elaborated writings of Luther. He worked on it as early as 1538, and, as we learn from a letter of Luther to Melanchthon of March 14, 1539 (De Wette, Vol. V, p. 172), completed it in the first half of March 1539. On March 16, Spalatin, who was present in Wittenberg, wrote to Wenceslaus Link that the book was already in print and would go out at Easter Mass (in April). On May 7, Justus Jonas was already busy translating this book into Latin. The first edition appeared under the title: "Von den Concilijs vnd Kirchen. D. Mart. Luth. Wittenberg. 1539." At the end: "Gedruckt zu Wittenberg durch Hans Lufft. M.D. XXXIX." 33 sheets in octavo. In the same year an edition in quarto appeared by the same; also a reprint in Strasbourg by "Crafft müller." In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1554), vol. VII, p. 501; in the Jena (1568), vol. VII, p. 218; in the Altenburg, vol. VII, p. 235; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 242; in the Erlanger (1st), vol. 25, p. 219, and in the second edition, vol. 25, p. 280. - We have left the superscriptions which Walch set according to the Wittenberg and Jena editions. - The third part of our work appeared in a single edition under the title: "Von der Kirchen, Was, wer vnd wo sie sey, vn wo bey man sie erkennen sol. D. Mar. Luther. 1540." No place given, 4 quarto sheets. A writing published under a very similar title is not to be confused with this, a large section from Luther's writing "Wider Hans Wurst," which in the Wittenberg edition (1554), vol. VII, pp. 553 d to 565, has the title: "Von der alten rechten Kirchen, Was, wo und wer sie sey, vnd wo bey man sie erkennen sol." The whole writing is then reprinted in the Wittenberg (1559), vol. XII, pp. 310 ff.

D. Mart. Luther's preface.

I. I have often laughed myself, where I have seen dogs offered a morsel of bread with a knife, and when they snatched at it, beaten on the muzzles with the handle, so that the poor dogs had not only to suffer the damage, but also the pain; and it is a fine laugh. But I did not think at that time that the devil would also have his laugh with us men, and take us for such poor dogs, until I learned it from the most holy father, the pope, both in his bulls, books, and daily practices, where he also does such a little doggerel with Christendom; but, O Lord God, how with great harm to souls, and mockery of the divine majesty. Just as he is doing now with the Concilio. All the world has cried out and waited for it, the good emperor and the whole empire have been working on it for twenty years, the pope has always put it off and put it off, and the emperor, as a dog, has always offered him a bite of bread until he has seen his time, and now he beats him over the muzzle and mocks him as his fool and juggler.

002 For he now sends forth the third time the council, but first sends his apostles into the countries, and bids kings and princes swear that they shall abide by the pope's doctrine. The bishops and their clergy agree to this, and do not want to give in to anything or allow anything to be reformed. And so the Council has already been decided before it begins. Namely, that nothing is to be reformed, but everything is to be kept as it has been customary until now. Is this not a fine concilium? It has not yet begun, and it has already determined what it should accomplish when it begins. That is, it hath beaten the Emperor on the snout, yea, it hath overtaken the Holy Ghost, and is far in advance of him. But I have been concerned about it, and I have often written and said that they would not and could not hold a council unless they had first captured and held the emperor, kings, and princes in their hands, so that they might be free to do whatever they wanted, to strengthen their tyranny, and to oppress Christianity with a much heavier burden than had ever been done before.

3. In the name of God, if you, lords, emperors, kings, princes, like it that such desperate, damned people trump you on the mouth and beat you on the snouts, then we must put up with it and think, They have done worse before, when they have deposed kings and emperors, cursed them, driven them out, betrayed them, murdered them, and played the devil's will with them, as the histories testify, and still intend to do so. Christ will nevertheless know how to find and preserve his Christianity, even against the gates of hell, even if emperors and kings could not and would not do anything about it. It is easier for him to help them, nor for them to help him. What should he have done before kings and emperors were born? And how should he do, if now there were no emperor nor king, though the world were full of devils raging against him? He is not unaccustomed to sour food, and he can cook much more sour food. Woe to those who must eat it!

4. But we poor, weak Christians, who must be called heretics by such saints, should be cheerful and of good cheer, praising and thanking God, the Father of all mercy, with all joy, that he takes care of us so warmly, and beats our murderers and bloodhounds with such Egyptian blindness and Jewish madness, that they must reproach them for not giving way to anything bad in any way, and want to let Christianity perish before they want to reform the least idolatry (of which they are full and overflowing). This they boast of, and do. Happy (I say) shall we be. For by this they make our cause better than we ever desired, and their cause worse than they may now think. They know and confess that they are wrong in many things, and that the Scriptures and God are against them, and yet they will go headlong against God, and knowingly defend wrong for right. Let a poor Christian go to the sacrament for such comfort, even unconfessed, and dare to touch a hundred necks where he would have them if he saw, or even had to grasp, that God reigns here and the devil there.

005 Thus we have now the final decision of the future Concilii at Vincent, and the

The strict judgment of the most recent Council (which is to be regarded as a good one), that all the world should despair of the reformation of the church, and that no interrogation can be permitted, but they want to let Christianity (as they boast) perish, that is, to have the devil himself as God and Lord, before they have Christ, and want to leave a small piece of their idolatry. Not content with this, they want to force us poor Christians with the sword, so that we also knowingly worship the devil with them and blaspheme Christ. No such defiance has ever been read or experienced in any history or time. Other tyrants have the poor honor of ignorantly crucifying the Lord of majesty, as the Turks, the Gentiles, and the Jews; but here are they who, under Christ's name, and as Christians, yea, the highest Christians, boast and arm themselves, speaking against Christ: We know that Christ's word and deed are against us: nevertheless we will not suffer his word, nor turn aside from it; but he shall turn aside from us, and suffer our idolatry: nevertheless we will be and be called Christians.

006 Forasmuch then as the pope with his own badly refuses to hold a council, and will not reform the church, nor do any counsel or help for it, but will defend his tyranny with iniquity, and let the church perish: so we cannot go further, and must, as the church so miserably forsaken by the pope, look elsewhere for counsel and help, and first seek and entreat a reformation from our Lord Christ. For the sake of such desperate tyrants' wickedness, which force us to despair of a concilio and reformation, we must not also despair of Christ, or leave the church without counsel and help, but do what we can, and let them go to the devil as they will.

He has said clearly and publicly that he not only does not want to be a Christian, nor does he want to be in the church (which he would rather let perish, so that he remains and does not perish with the church), but also wants to do that the church should perish; as they then also prove all this, about such words, with the deed terribly, and let so many hundred parishes become desolate, and the churches perish without pastors, preaching and sacrament.

008 In time past the bishops, and every Christian, were martyred, and perished with thanksgiving and gladness for the dear church; and Christ himself perished for his church, that the same might remain and be preserved. But now the pope and his followers boast that the church should perish for them, so that they may remain in their tyranny, idolatry, evil, and all kinds of wickedness. How thinkest thou of these fellows? They will abide, and the church shall perish. Where shall we go in or out? But if the church is to perish, Christ must first perish, on whom it is built, as on a rock against the gates of hell. If Christ is to perish, then God himself must perish first, who has laid such a rock and foundation. Who could have imagined that such great power would be in the hands of such lords, that the church would so easily perish, along with Christ and God Himself, before their presence? They must be far, far more powerful than the gates of hell and all the devils, before whom the church has remained and must remain.

009 They cry (I say) herewith against themselves, that they would not be the church, nor in the church, but would be the worst enemies of the church, and help it to perish. For hitherto they have so plagued us with the words, "Church, church!" and there has been no end to their crying and spitting, that they should be halls for the church; and they have miserably heretical, cursed, and murdered us, that we do not want to hear them as the church. Now I think we are honestly and mightily absolved, that they no longer want to call us heretics, nor can they, because they no longer want to be praised as the church, but want to "let the church perish" as enemies, and also help to suppress it. For it

It does not compute that they could be the church at the same time, and yet let the church perish before they would perish, yea, let a hair's breadth of them perish. That is out, .and is called: Lx oro tuo ts ^uckieo, Lorvo uoguum.

(10) If the Last Day were not near, it would not be surprising that heaven and earth should fall upon such blasphemy. But because God can suffer such things, the Day must not be far off. But they laugh at it all, and do not think that God has made them blind, insane, mad, and foolish, but must think it great wisdom and manhood. I would also be safe with them if they were alone in their raving. But the great wrath of God, which is shown in them, terrifies me greatly, and it would be high time and need that we all meant and prayed earnestly, as Christ did over Jerusalem [Luke 23:28], and forbade the women not to weep over him, but over themselves and their children. For they believe not that the time of their visitation is come, neither will they believe it, though they see it, or hear it, or smell it, or taste it, or touch it, or feel it.

011 How then shall it be attacked, because the pope will not give us a true council, nor suffer some reformation, but will cause the church to perish with his own? And has therefore turned himself out of the church, that he may remain, and not perish in or with the church? He is gone, and hath given the valete to the church. How shall we now (I say) attack or take it, because we must be without a pope? For we are the church, or in the church, if the papists will let us go to the ground, that they may remain. Nevertheless, we would gladly remain, and with our Lord Christ and his Father, God of us all, we do not want to perish so miserably in the face of the papists' defiance; but we think that a council or reformation is necessary in the church, because we see such gross abuses that, even if we were oxen and asses, silent as men or Christians, and could not notice them with our eyes or ears, we would have to feel them with our paws and claws and stumble over them. How? if we be a subordinate church against the abiding lords, without the pope, and and held a concilium themselves without their will, and brought about a reformation, which would be very inconvenient to the remaining nobles, and yet they would have to suffer the same? But we will take up the matter, because we have now lost the most holy head, the pope, and must counsel ourselves, as much as our Lord will give.

That the church cannot be reformed according to the fathers and the churches. 1)

001 For some years therefore many of the papists have laboured with the Conciliis and Fathers, until at last they have brought together all the Conciliis in one book: which labour I have not disliked, not having seen the Conciliis together before. And among them (in my opinion) are some good, pious hearts, who would like to see the church reformed according to the same manner and measure of the Conciliar and Fathers, but who are nevertheless also moved that the present state of the church in the papacy is in a very shameful way (as is evident) in harmony with the manner of the Conciliar and Fathers. But in that case their good opinion is all in vain. For they undoubtedly intend such an opinion, that the pope with his own would or should also enter into such a reformation. But this is in vain. For the pope stands with his abiding lords, and defiantly says, against them as well as against us, that they will let the church perish before they give way a little; that is, they will let Concilia and Fathers perish also before they give way a little. For where one should follow the concilii and fathers, help God, where do the pope and present bishops want to stay? Truly, they must become the submerged church, and not be the abiding lords.

002 I will not speak of the old years, which may be numbered a thousand or fourteen hundred after the birth of Christ. It is not yet more than a hundred years since the holy way of the pope began, that he gave to a priest two fiefs, as cathedrals or parishes, of which the theologians of Paris and their comrades cried out many terrible things.

1) This superscription is in the Wittenberg and in the Jena editions.

and have murmured. I am not yet sixty years old, nor do I know that in my memory it has come to pass that one bishop has more than one foundation. But the pope has eaten everything, stolen the annals and everything, and divided the bishoprics into threes, monasteries and benefices into tens and twenties. How can he spit all this back, and let his office be torn asunder for the sake of the fathers or Concilia? Ay, thou sayest, it is an abuse. Well then, take thy ancient concilia and fathers before thee, and reform all these things. For it was not so a hundred years ago, nor sixty years ago, when thou wast not born.

003 What then is the use of thy reformation after the fathers and conciliarities? Thou hearest that the pope and bishops will not suffer it. And if they will not suffer the state of the church, as it was fifty years ago, when I and thou were children, how will or can they suffer us to reform them with the state of the church, as it was six hundred, a thousand, fourteen hundred years ago? Such an undertaking is badly impossible, because the pope sits in the possession and wants to be unreformed. Therefore both Concilia and the fathers must be in vain in such matters, along with everything we can think or say about them. For the pope is over Concilia, over fathers, over kings, over God, over angels. Let me see, bring him down, and make the fathers and Concilia masters over him. If thou doest this, I will cheerfully fall upon thee and assist thee. But as long as this is not done, what is the use of your talking or writing much about concilii or fathers? There is no one to take it up. For if the pope does not want to be with us in the reformation, and to be thrown with us among the concilii and fathers, together with his immortal lords cardinals and bishops, neither is concilium of any use, nor can some reformation be hoped for with him. For he will cast it all to the ground, and make us hold our peace.

004 But if they desire that we, according to the councils and fathers, should let ourselves be reformed with them, and help the church, though the pope with his own would not do so, nor suffer it: to this I give two answers: either they are bitter, poisonous, evil, and mean no good; or are kind-hearted, and mean right, as much as they can. Let it be said to the first, that they first take themselves by the nose, and pull the beam out of their eye, together with the pope and cardinals, or immediately without the pope and cardinal, 2c. love and keep the concilia and fathers. If this be done, let us, after such a holy example, be there speedily, and be much better than they are. For we are not such desperate people (praise and thanks to God) that we would let the Church perish before we would give way, even in great pieces, if it is not against God, but are ready to perish until there is neither skin nor hair, before any harm or damage should befall the Church, as much as is in our knowledge and ability.

005 But where they themselves do not respect the fathers and conciliarities, and yet would compel us to do so, that is also too coarse, and we must say to them, Nockieo, eura teipsuru, and as Christ saith [Matt. 23:4], "They lay upon men's necks burdens which are unmistakable, which they themselves will not touch with one finger." This is no good, and we have no small cause to refuse it, especially because they pretend so great holiness of the fathers and conciliarities, which we do not keep, and they themselves keep and show us nothing but in words and out of paper. For we confess, and must confess, that we are quite poor and weak Christians, and that in many things.

006 First, that we have so much to do day and night in the faith, reading, thinking, writing, teaching, exhorting, comforting, both ourselves and others, that verily there is neither time nor space left us, even to think whether concilia or fathers have ever been, let alone that we should be troubled with the high pieces of plates, chasubles, long skirts, 2c. and their high holiness. If they have come so high, and become even angelic, and have faith so abundant, that they must be satisfied with the teusel, and not cause them to err, nor frighten their consciences: this we weak Christians have not yet attained, nor do we fear that we shall not attain on earth. Therefore they should be merciful to us.

And be merciful, and not condemn that we cannot be equal to their holiness. For if then we should depart from our work, which we have in matters of faith, and, as the weak, submit to their strong holiness in clothing and food, we should leave our weak holiness, and yet not attain to their high strong holiness, and so sit down between two stools.

007 But if they will not be gracious and merciful unto us, we must let them be angels, and dance in paradise among the flowers of the air, as they have long since torn the faith in their shoes, and in their heavenly holiness have no temptation, neither of the flesh, nor of the world: but we, labouring and scavenging in the mire and mire, as they that are almost poor in the faith, and beginning disciples, cannot be such high doctors and masters in the faith. For if we had as much faith as they seem to have, we would carry and hold plates, cassels, concilia, and fathers much more easily than they do. But because this is not so, they bear it lightly (for to bear nothing is to bear it very lightly), and boast that we will not bear it.

(8) Likewise, we poor Christians also have to do with the commandments of God, so much so that we cannot wait for other high works which they boast of in them, spiritual, conciliatory and paternal. For we practice and exercise both ourselves and ours with the greatest diligence, that we love God above all things and our neighbor as ourselves; that we be humble and patient, merciful and mild, chaste and sober, not stingy nor envious, and what are the commandments of God more. We would gladly that there were no greed, avarice, usury, envy, lust, gluttony, adultery, or lechery among our people, but they are so weak and puny that we can do little of such good works. The great house remains as it is, and grows worse every day. Now consider, because we are so weak in doing such necessary works as God has commanded, how can we be weighed down by them, and give ourselves up to the high, strong, unnecessary works of which they tell us? If we had done these godly, low, contemptible (or as they destroy it) civil works, then, whether God wills it, we would also do their spiritual, ecclesiastical works of meat-eating, of clothing, of days 2c. anfaen to do.

009 But they have done well, because they have kept the commandment of God, love God above all things, have neither covetousness nor usury, neither adulterers nor fornicators, neither drunkards nor drunkards, neither pride nor envy, 2c. but do all such little good works of God so easily, that they are badly idle. Therefore it is fair that they, above such our civil works, do stronger and higher works, according to the church or fathers obedience, as they are much too strong to practice such low good works with us, have leaped far beyond and preceded us. But they should still, according to their high, strong mercy, and according to St. Paul's teaching, have compassion on us weak, poor Christians, and not condemn us or mock us that we go so childishly to learn at the pews, even crawl in the mud, and could not with such light feet and legs leap and dance above and apart from God's commandments, as they do, the strong heroes and giants, who can do greater and higher works, neither there is God above all, and love the neighbor as themselves. Which St. Paul calls the fulfillment of the law, Rom. 13, 10, and Christ also, Matth. 5, 19.

010 But if they will not have compassion upon us, ask only for a season and a time, until we have fulfilled the commandments of God, and the little children's works; and we will gladly join in their high, spiritual, chivalrous, manly works. For what is it good that a child should be forced to walk and work like a strong man? Nothing comes of it, the child cannot do it. So also we poor, weak Christians, who walk in God's commandments and His little good works as children at the pews, sometimes barely crawling on all fours, yes, even slipping on the ground, and Christ has to control us as a mother or maid controls a child, cannot walk or do as well as their strong, manly walking and doing; and God also protects us for this. Therefore let us spare ourselves from ecclesiastical and conciliar holiness (as they say) until we have nothing more to do in God's commandments and divine works. And suffer not such reformation, as we also cannot. Let this much be answered this time to the first that covet such reformation of us in evil opinion.

011 To the others who think it right and good, as they hope, though in vain, that perhaps such a fine reformation, of their opinion, might yet come from the Fathers and Concilii, whether the pope would not or would hinder it, I will again answer in good opinion thus: that I regard it as an impossible thing, and indeed know not how it is to be attacked. For I have also read the fathers, even before I sat down so stiffly against the pope; I have also read them with better diligence, neither those who now by them defy and pride themselves against me. For I know that no man hath tried to read a book of the holy scriptures in the schools, and to use the fathers' scriptures for it, as I have done. And let them take another book before them out of the holy scriptures, and seek the glosses of the fathers, and it shall be unto them as it was unto me, when I took the epistle aā Mraeos with St. Chrysostom's glosses, and Titum, Galatas with the help of St. Hieronymi, Genesin with the help of St. Ambrosii and Augustini, the Psalter with all the scribes that can be had, and so on. I have read more than they think, and I have read all the books, so that they are too presumptuous to think that I have not read the fathers; and they want to make me believe that this is a wonderful thing, which twenty years ago I had to hold in low esteem when I was supposed to be reading the Scriptures.

(12) St. Bernard boasts that he learned his understanding from the trees, as oaks and firs, which were his doctors, that is, he exercised and received his thoughts from the Scriptures under the trees; he also says that he holds the holy fathers in high esteem, but does not respect all that they have spoken; he puts such a reason and similitude: he would rather drink from the spring itself than from the booklet. As all men do, when they drink of the fountain, forgetting the little book, because they have need of the little book to come to the fountain. So the Scripture must remain master and judge, or if we follow the little books too closely, they will lead us too far from the spring, and we will lose both,

Tasty and powerful, until they are lost in the salted sea, as it happened under the papacy.

But enough of this. We want to show the reasons why such a thing is impossible. First of all, it is evident that the Conciliar Churches are not only unequal, but also opposed to one another, as are the Fathers. If we should now wish to bring them together, there would be much greater strife and disputation than there is now, and we could never come out of it. For since they are very unequal and often opposed to one another, we would first have to work out how to pick out the best and leave the rest. Then things would be settled; one would say, If you want to keep them, keep them at all, or keep nothing. The other would say, "Pick out what you like, and leave what you don't like. Who wants to be a shepherd here?"

014 Behold the decree in which Gratianus had just such a nobility, that therefore also the book is called Oonooraantia äwooraantiarum, that is, he wished to compare unequal sayings of the fathers and conciliarities, to tolerate the repugnant ones, and to pick out the best, and he was cunning as the crab goes; he often let the best go, and kept the worst, and yet neither compared nor tolerated. As the lawyers themselves say, it stinks of honour and avarice, and a canonist is a loud ass. How much more, then, should it go with us, if it came to this, that we should agree on all the fathers' and concilia's sayings or ways? There would be lost toil and labour, and made worse. And I will not enter into such disputation, for I know that there would be no end, and in the end we would have to keep a vain uncertain thing, with the harm of vain, lost labor and time. They are too yellow around the beak, the young paper clickers, and even too untried, that they think what they read and imagine, that must be so, and all the world adore, if they do not yet know the ABC neither in the Scriptures, nor have tried in the Conciliis and Fathers; scream and spit therefore, do not know what they say or write.

Fifteenth I will be silent of Gratiani. Sanct Augustine writes lamentably that in his time the church was ready, that is, three hundred years after the birth of Christ (for he died in 1539, eleven hundred and two years later), and that it was so well weighed down with the bishops' essays that even the Jews' nature was more sorrowful and more tolerable. And sets clear and dry these words: InnumerMlidus 86rvilidu8 oneriduZ premuM Loole8iam, that is, with innumerable burdens they press the church; when the Jews are weighed down by God alone, not by men 2c. Speaks also there, that Christ would have his church burdened with few and light ceremonies, namely, baptism and sacrament; shows also none more than these two, as every one can read. The books are there, so that no one can blame me for inventing such things.

016 But he putteth also a woman's rift therein, and saith in the same place, 8oo Z6NU8 bridet lidera8 od86rvations8, that is, no man is bound to keep all these things, but may leave them without sin. If here St. Augustine is not a heretic, I shall never be a heretic, who throws so many bishops, so many churches' wise men, into the fire in one heap, and points to baptism and sacrament alone. Eighth, that Christ would not have laid any more burdens on the church, if they should be called burdens, which is comfort and grace, as he saith, "My burden is light, and my weight is pleasant," [Matt. 11:30] that is, my burden is peace, and my weight is joy.

017 But the fine man of sense does this honor to the great (or as it is called) universal or principal conciliarities, separating them from the other and all bishops' essays, and saying that they ought to be held in high esteem, writes in the same place that such great principal conciliarities ought to be kept in good order, as being much concerned with them, and that I need his words, 8a1ud6rrima autorita8, that is, that it is very useful that they should be held in high esteem. But he never saw any of the same great concilia, nor gewest therein, would perhaps have written otherwise or more of them. For there are no more neither four great Hanptconcilia in all books almost famous and known, so that the Roman-

The bishops compare them to the four gospels, as they cry out in their decrees. The first is Nicenum, held at Nicea in Asia, in the fifteenth year of the great Constantine, nearly thirty-five years before the birth of Augustus. The other at Constantinople, in the third year of Gratian the Emperor, and Theodosii the First, who reigned with each other. At that time St. Augustine was still a pagan and not a Christian, a man of about 26 years, so that he could not have taken care of all these things. He did not experience the third at Ephesus, much less the fourth at Chalcedon. All these things are found in the history and account of the years; that is certain.

(18) I must say this for the sake of St. Augustine's word that the great principal councils should be held in high esteem, since it is important that his opinion be rightly understood, namely, that he alone spoke of the two councils at Nicea and Constantinople, which he had not seen, but afterwards learned from writings, and at that time no bishop was above another. For the bishops, Roman or otherwise, could never have brought about such conciliarities if the emperors had not brought them together. As the particularia or small Concilia show, so without the emperor's occupation now and then in countries the bishops themselves have held among themselves. That I respect it, after my foolishness, the great concilia, or universalia, have such a name from the fact that the bishops are called together from all countries by the monarch, the great head or universal.

(19) For the history must bear me witness to this, and all the papists should become mad, that the bishop of Rome, Sylvester, if the emperor Constantine had not done it, the first Concilium of Nicea would have had to remain unconvened for his sake. And what did the wretched bishop of Rome want to do, since the bishops of Asia and Grecia were not subject to him? And if he had been able to do it without the Emperor Constantine's power, he would have taken it to Nicea in Asia, so far across the sea, since no one gave in to his power (as he well knew and had experienced), but in the Welschland to Rome, or near there, and forced the Emperor to come there. Even so I also say of the other three great conciliarities (as named above): if the emperors Gratian, Theodosius, and the other Theodosius and Martian had not assembled the same three great conciliarities, they would never have been held in Rome for the sake of the bishop and all the bishops. For the bishops of other countries gave as much to the Roman bishop as the bishops of Mainz, Trier, and Cologne give to one another for the sake of their sovereignty, and much less.

020 But it is seen in the histories, that the Roman bishops also before have always pestered, sicklied, coughed, and crowned for the rule over all the bishops, but have not been able to bring it to pass before the monarchs. For they wrote many letters, now in Africa, now in Asia, and so on, even before the Niceno Concilio, that nothing should be ordered publicly without the Roman see. But at that time no one heeded it, and the bishops at that time in Africa, Asia, and Egypt, as if they did not hear it; though they gave it fine good words, and humbled themselves, yet they admitted nothing. You will find this if you read the Histories and compare them with diligence. But thou must not turn aside to her and her hypocrites' cries, but keep the text and history in the face or mirror.

021 Now, since the word Concilium was highly exalted among Christians throughout the world, even by the aforesaid Scripture of St. Augustine, and such fine monarchs or emperors were there, the Roman bishops have always sought how they might bring the name Concilii to themselves, that all Christendom might believe what they say, and under such a fine name secretly become monarchs themselves (what is the matter, I meet here the truth and their own conscience, where they might have a conscience!). And so it has come to pass, they have been ashamed and have been confirmed, that they have now become Constantinus, Gratianus, Theodosius, Martianus, and many more than the same four monarchs, together with their four great chief concilia. For the Pope's Concilia are now called: Bio volo, sie zudso, 8it pro ratiovo volunta8. Yet not in all the world, nor in all Christendom, but in that part of the Roman Empire which OorolvZ NaZnu8 had; by the same they have almost much until, possessed by all the devils, they have shamefully murdered, trampled underfoot, and betrayed many emperors in many ways, as they still do wherever they can.

Of the Baier Scripture Authority. 1)

Twenty-two: But this time let it suffice what Saint Augustine writes of the Conciliar. We also want to show what he thinks of the fathers. Of these, then, he says in the letter to St. Jerome, which also Gratianus ciist. 9: I have learned this, that I alone do not hold the sacred Scriptures to be erroneous; all the others I read thus, they being as holy and learned as they can be, I do not therefore think it right that they should have taught thus, where they do not prove it to me by Scripture or reason that [it] must be so. Item, in the same place in the decree stands also St. Augustine's saying from the preface lidorum cke^rinitate: Dear one, do not follow my writings as you do the sacred Scriptures, but what you find in the sacred Scriptures that you did not believe before, believe without a doubt; but in my writings you shall have nothing for certain that you had uncertain before, unless it is proved to you by me that [it] is certain.

023 Such sayings he writes much more in other places, as when he saith, As I read other men's books, so will I have read mine 2c. I will leave the other sayings for now; the papists know well that such things are written in Augustine from time to time, and several of them are included in the decree. Nor do they do contrary to their conscience, that they pass over or suppress such sayings. The fathers, Concilia, and even the bishops of Rome, who were generally very unlearned men, are above all this. St. Augustine must have felt many a lack in the fathers who preceded him, because he wanted to be uncaptured, but to have subjected them all, along with himself, to the holy Scriptures. What would have been necessary for him to oppose his forefathers in this way, so that he also says: they are as holy and learned as they can be? Surely he could have

Saying, Yea, all that they write, I hold the same as the holy scripture, because they are so holy and learned. But he says, No; as he also says in another letter to St. Jerome, who was very angry because St. Augustine would not let him have the Commentary on Galatians in one piece: Dear brother (as he has been a fine friendly man), I do not hope that you would have kept your books like the books of the apostles and prophets 2c.

024 If only such a pious and gentle man would not ascribe such letters to me, and beg me not to esteem my books like the books of the apostles and prophets, as St. Augustine ascribes to St. Jerome, I should be ashamed to death. But this is how we act now, that St. Augustine has well noticed how the fathers have also been men at times, and that Cap. Rom. 7, 18. ff; therefore he will not trust, neither his forefathers, holy, learned fathers, nor himself, much less, no doubt, the descendants, who should become less, but will have the Scriptures as master and judge. Just as it is said above of St. Bernard that the oaks and firs have been his masters, he would rather drink from the spring than from the booklet. He would not have spoken such things if he had held the fathers' books equal to the holy scriptures, and had found no lack in them, but would have said thus: It is the same whether I drink from the Scriptures or from the fathers. He does not do this, but lets the books flow and drinks from the fountain.

025 What then shall we do? If we are to restore the church to the doctrine or manner of the fathers and councils, St. Augustine stands here, and misleads us, and makes us find no end to our opinion, because he does not wish to be evil, neither to fathers, bishops, councils, be they how holy and learned they may be, nor to have trusted in him himself, but directs us to the Scriptures; if not, he says, it is all uncertain, lost, and in vain. But if we exclude St. Augustine, it is contrary to our purpose, namely, that we should have a church according to the doctrine of the fathers. For where St. Augustine was chosen out of the number of the fathers

The others are not of much value, nor will it be said, nor suffered, that St. Augustine should not be considered one of the best fathers, since he is esteemed the highest in all Christendom, and has hitherto preserved both schools and churches at their best, as is the case at the present day. And yet you compel us to such infinite toil and labor, that we should hold conciliarities and fathers beforehand against the Scriptures, and judge according to the same? Before this is done, we shall all be dead, and the last day shall come long before.

Of the first Concilii, namely, of the Apostles, statutes. 1)

(26) Now then, let us put aside St. Augustine, St. Bernard, and others like them, and consider the Conciliarities and Fathers ourselves, and see if we can live our lives according to them. But we want to take the very best before us, so that we do not make it too long, especially the first two main concilia that St. Augustine praises, namely, the one at Nicea and Constantinople, even though he did not see them, as is said above. Yes, that we may play our parts with the utmost certainty, and not lack, nor care, let us take the very first Concilium of the Apostles, held at Jerusalem, of which St. Lucas writes in Acts 15:28 and 16:4. There it is written that the apostles boasted that the Holy Spirit had ordered such things through them: Visum est Apiritui 8un6to st nobis sts, "It pleaseth the Holy Ghost and us to lay no more burden upon you, but these things needful, that ye abstain from things sacrificed unto idols, from blood, from things strangled, and from fornication: from which, if ye abstain, ye do well."

027 Then we hear that the Holy Ghost (as the preachers of the Conciliar boast) hath commanded us, that we should eat no things sacrificed unto idols, neither blood, nor things strangled. If therefore we would have a church according to this Concilio (as is proper, because it is the highest and first, held also by the apostles themselves), we must now teach and enforce that no prince, lord, citizen, nor peasant shall henceforth eat geese, deer, stags, pork in the

1) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

Eat blacks, also need to avoid the fish gala speeches of Karpen. For there comes to blood, or, as the cooks call it, color. And especially the citizens and farmers must not eat red sausage or black pudding. For this is not only thin blood, but also delivered and cooked, a very coarse blood. Likewise we must not eat hares nor birds. For they are all suffocated (as the law of the hunter deals with them), if they are not boiled in blood or black, but roasted alone.

028 If we then, after this council, abstain from blood, we shall let the Jews be masters in our church and kitchens. For they have a particularly large book of blood-smoking, over which no one could leap with a pole, and they seek the blood so carefully that they do not eat meat with any Gentile or Christian, even if it is not smothered, but slaughtered in the purest way (like oxen and calves), and washed and watered with the blood, they would much rather die. Help God, what afflicted Christians we should become over the Concilio, even with the two pieces alone, eating blood and choking! Well then, behold, whoever is willing and able, and bring Christendom to the obedience of this Concilii, then I will almost gladly follow. If not, then I will be overpowered by the cry: Concilia, Concilia! you hold no Concilia nor fathers. Or, again, I will cry: Thou thyself holdest no Concilia nor Fathers, because thou despisest this highest Concilium, and the highest Fathers, the Apostles themselves. What thinkest thou that I ought or oughtest to hold Concilia and Fathers, which thou thyself wilt not touch with one finger? Then would I say, As I said unto the sabbath keepers beforehand their law of Moses, so will we keep it. But since they do not keep it, nor can they keep it, it is ridiculous for them to think we should keep it.

029 Sayest thou, it is not now possible to make such a concilium, because the antagonism is too far broken down. This is of no avail, because we have undertaken to be guided by the councils, and it is said here that the Holy Spirit has ordered it. Against the Holy Spirit no far nor deep tearing is valid, and with such an evasion no conscience is safe.

Shall

If we are to be of the same church, we must keep this council before all others; if not, we may keep none of the other councils, and so be rid of all councils. For in this council there are not bad bishops or fathers, as in others, but the apostles themselves, as sure of the Holy Spirit, and supreme fathers. Nor is it so impossible that we should shun blood and strangled things. How would it be if we had to eat only grain, cabbage, turnips, apples, and all other fruits of the earth and trees, as our ancestors did before the flood, when it was not yet permitted to eat flesh? We would not die of hunger, if we did not eat flesh and fish. How many people still live today who seldom eat fish or meat in the year 1) and yet do not die in the year because of it? So the impossibility of strengthening our conscience against the Holy Spirit is of no avail to us, for we might well bring it again, without harm to body and soul, that we should not only live without blood and suffocation, as Moses teaches, but also feed ourselves without fish and flesh at all, as before the flood of sin. I am also very much surprised that the devil, among so many of the spirits of the wicked, has not at this time brought to light these beautiful thoughts of avoiding the flesh, 2) which have such excellent examples or Scriptures for them.

(30) Let us say, then, that all this is not only impossible, but also has fallen from itself, and has come into disuse or disuse, as I am wont to call the canons, which have no more use, mortuos; nor will this hold the sting. I am well aware that the pope and his followers are seeking such a remedy from this, and that they are mending it, that the church had the power to change such a council of the apostles, in which they are lying. For they can produce no testimony of the church, which did such things, or commanded them to be changed. Neither is it proper for the church to change the order of the Holy Spirit, and never will.

1) The words: "in the year" and following: "and yet therefore the year does not die?" are missing in the first edition, but are in the second and in the Wittenberg and in the Jena.

2) "to avoid from the flesh". See the previous note.

3) Thus the Jenaer. In the other editions: "Bruch".

031 But beside this they see not, the blind leaders, how they bind a rod upon their own skins with such speeches. For if we allow that men have power to change the order and commandment of the Holy Spirit, we will quickly trample the pope underfoot with all his letters and bulls, and say, "If the apostle's first decree is not valid, since we are sure that the Holy Spirit made it, as they boast: Visum est, how much less should the pope's authority and decrees be valid, since we are nowhere so certain that the Holy Spirit is with them as with the apostles. For we must nevertheless allow the apostles to be something; and even if they were not above the popes (as the heretic Luther holds), they must nevertheless be allowed to sit beside the popes. And to be sure, the popes have often been manifest, desperate knaves, and still, 4) even one has rejected another's decree for and for, yet the Holy Spirit cannot be so against himself, and the apostles have not been such popes or knaves. Therefore one must speak differently about this; such lazy jokes will not do, because one would say that the church was built on a reed, which the wind weaves to and fro, after which the priest or man would be at a loss. For the church must not float on a reed, but lie on a rock, and be certainly established. Matth. 7, 26. and Cap. 16, 18.

Thirty-two: But as we began to say, it fell from him himself, without the change of the church; therefore it must be held no longer. Ay, my good friend, the lawyer speaks. If a right be not kept, or if it be made unjust by not being kept, or by being fallen, let us be of good cheer, and keep no more law. Let a harlot say that she is right, because the sixth commandment is fallen among adulterers and adulteresses, and is no longer in use. Yes, we children of Adam, together with the devils, want to hold a concilium against God and conclude: Hear it, O God, with us men and devils all thy commandments are fallen, and are no more in use; therefore we shall no more keep them, but must do contrary unto them; and thou shalt let this be lawful, and not condemn us, because there is no

4) "and still" is missing from the first edition.

Sin is where justice has fallen. So may robbers and murderers also make themselves blessed, saying, We are no longer obliged to obey you princes and lords, but are justified in defending you and robbing you, because your right has fallen with us. 2c.

033 Now counsel here, how shall we do? It does not help that such a Concilium of the Apostles has fallen (which is the truth), or has been changed by the church (which is a lie), what harm is it to scratch out the word "Holy Ghost," and let the Apostles alone have done it, without the Holy Ghost, so we might help matters? Is that ridiculous? Think thou better of it. For if the Holy Spirit be not scratched out of the Concilio, both must be done, either that both we and the papists think and hold such Concilium; or, if it be free and not held, that we poor heretics be left alone with the cry, Concilia, Concilia, Concilia! For where this Concilium is not to be kept, there is none to be kept for the others, as has been said. Otherwise they shall hear again this cry, Nsclws, eara Isipsuw, house, take thyself by the nose; let them keep it first, that cry so, we will gladly tread after. If not, it is found that they do not cry out and spit this word, Concilia, Concilia, with earnestness, but trumpet it in the mouths of men, and scare the poor consciences treacherously and wickedly, and only want to destroy the simple souls.

034 I shew all these things of this council, because it is the first and chief thing that we should consider these things, before we let the church live or be governed according to the councils. For if this Concilium gives us so much confusion, what shall it become if we also make the others? It is true, and I confess it, that the word Concilium is soon named, and this sermon, that one should keep the Concilia, is easily done. But how to stand to it, that it may be set up again, where now? where there, dear friend? The pope is well wise with his own, and soon comes away, and says: he is above all concilia, and may hold what he pleases, and allow others to hold as far as he pleases. Yea, if the matter be so advised, let us take the word Concilium, and the sermon, "Let the Concilia hold" silent, and for that shout: Pabst, Pabst! and: "We must keep the pope's doctrine. So we all soon get away from it, and become fine Christians as they are. For what is the Concilium to us, if we cannot or will not keep it, but only praise the name or the letter?

35 Or, that seems to me to be much better (because we are now talking so much, and also have to joke a little in this carnival), if it is only about the letters, "Concilium," without the fact and consequence that we made the chair writers pope, cardinals, bishops and preachers; because they could write such letters finely. They could write such letters finely, large, small, black, red, green, yellow, and however one wanted it. Then the church would be finely governed according to the conciliis, and it would not be necessary to keep what is ordered in the conciliis, but the church would have enough of such letters: Concilium, Concilium. But if we are not pleased with the chair-writers, let us take painters, carvers, and printers, who will paint, carve, and print for us beautiful Concilia, and then the church will be well governed. And let us make the painters, carvers, printers also popes, cardinals, and bishops! What further may one ask, how to hold the Concilii decree? There is enough of letters and images.

036 And concerning this, let us think, How if all men were blind, and could not see such Conciliarities, written, painted, carved, printed? How then would the church be governed by the Concilia? Is it my advice to take the choir students of Halberstadt and Magdeburg, when they sing the Huieunyue, and let them shout for it: Concilium, Concilium! that the church and vaults shake, they could be heard, even far across the Elbe, if we were all blind. Then the church would be well governed, and vain popes, cardinals, and bishops would be made out of such choir students, as they could easily govern the church, which otherwise has become impossible for the most holy fathers at Rome. But I will soon say more about this Concilio, it is too much for me; I must not forget the Concilium of Nicea, which is the best and first universal after the Apostles' Concilium.

Of statutes of the other Conecilii, at Nicea. 1)

037 The same council, among other things, enjoins that Christians who have fallen shall be received again to repentance for seven years. 2c. But if they die, they are to be released, and the sacrament is not to be withheld. Which, however, the Conciliators do not now hold, but do contrary, and relegate the dying Christians to Purgatory with the rest of their penance. For where the pope should keep this piece, devil! what a poor beggar should he become with all the monasteries, if such mines, treasure troves, and commerce, namely purgatory, masses, pilgrimages, foundations, brotherhoods, indulgences, bulls 2c. had to perish? Of which things of the same time the fathers knew nothing, nor ever dreamed. 2) May the devil protect the pope together with all cardinals, bishops, monks, and nuns, so that the church is not governed according to this Council. Where did they want to stay? But because this piece affects me alone, who has hitherto done this against the pope, and thinks very well how they might turn and interpret the word of the Council against me, I will now let it go, and must now act in a way that concerns us both in common, to the praise and honor of the councilors.

038 The same council decrees that those who leave war for religion's sake, and then go to war again, shall be admitted to the sacrament for five years under the oatsellumenis, and then for two years. I now take the word "religion" to mean the common Christian faith; of which more hereafter. I also do not want to dispute now, so that I do not get off the road and have my course hindered by such random questions as whether the Concilium forbade war, or had the power and right to forbid or condemn such (where the warriors otherwise do not deny the faith, of which the previous piece speaks).

039 But this is our business, whether such an article be held, or yet to be held, by right, that

1) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

2) This sentence is missing from the first edition.

that no man of war can be blessed or a Christian? For it is impossible to restore the same article, much less the apostle's decree of blood sausage, black pudding, and the like, as stated above, the pope himself, with all his own, will have to testify. Thus the Concilium does not speak of murderers, robbers, and enemies, but of militia; that is, of proper wars, where a prince, king, or emperor lies freely in the field with his ensign, since God Himself has commanded that one should be subject and obedient to them, Romans 13:1 ff, even if they were pagans, provided they do not force us to war against God, as St. Moritz and many others have done.

040 Now therefore let us govern the churches after this council. First, put away the sword from Caesar, and then command all the world to keep peace, and that no one make war or suffer war. For war is forbidden with seven years' penance, in the Council of Nicea. What more do we want, the church is now governed, no warriors are allowed, the devil is dead, and all the years, since the time of this Council, have been golden years, even eternal life in the highest peace, where otherwise the Council's statute is right and must be kept.

041 But we must have here excellent, good painters, which can paint us such churches, that we may see them. Or if we were blind, we would have to have much larger screamers than the choir students in Halberstadt, so that we could still hear them. The chair writers could perhaps write the letters "Concilium" also, as they have more color, and could make better letters, neither we poor Christians. But because the work is no longer there, we cannot be saved by letters, images, and cries. We must speak of things differently, and leave the letters, pictures, and cries to the papists. It is our duty to live according to the Conciliar, and not to praise the letters "Concilium" alone, because we want to be Christians.

042 If thou sayest that the Concilium is to be understood of such Christians as run after war of their own accord for the sake of money, they are to be condemned as high as that, or else it would be

It is a mockery that a concilium should condemn so highly obedience to ordinary war or worldly authority. In the name of God, I will gladly be an incomprehensible fool and ass, who of course also holds the Concilia in high esteem. Interpret it as well as thou canst, for I am well pleased. But tell me this, whether you were present at the Concilio of Nicea, where such an article was set down, that you can so certainly claim such an interpretation? If not, where did you read it? For the article saith of wars, not of unrighteous wars, which without necessity would have been condemned by Concilia, because they are also highly condemned among all heathen according to reason, who are not Christians nor Concilia.

(43) If a king or a prince must fight and defend himself by war, he must take what he can get. But if such warriors are to be condemned, where will emperors, kings, and princes stand now that there are no other warriors but warriors? Tell me, shall the lords war in their own persons, or weave straw men against their enemies? and ask thou the council of the Concilium whether it be done. Yes, my dear, it is easily said, Concilium has commanded this, if one looks at the letters like a cow at a gate, and does not think what belongs to it, and how one must keep it, and do it accordingly. And why did not the popes and bishops themselves afterwards keep it? who have caused so much war and bloodshed all over the world, and are still doing it without ceasing, and are still crying out: Concilia, Concilia! Fathers, fathers! but that they may freely oppose them, and take out what they have done from us.

(44) Luther, by this manner thou shouldest almost suspect the Concilium of Nicea, as if it had been seditious! For if we now taught that the emperor and the men of war (who had right things) were condemned, we would be considered rebellious, according to our own writings. I am now (I say) and must be well conciliar; hereafter I will speak further of it and explain myself. Now I say, as above, that the Concilium cannot speak otherwise than of proper warfare, which is then in use by the Roman Empire.

But the footmen or infantry, who in those days were called nilitos, were established citizens who had their annual pay forever, so that when the father died or became too old, the son had to go in his father's place as a warrior, and was forced to do so, as the Turk still does now. I have been told that the King of France does almost the same in Switzerland, and also gives pay to the children. If it be true, let it not be a lie.

045 So also the Reuters were eternal and hereditary warriors, and keeping their pay, were called

Now these are almost our nobles, who must sit armed with horse and armor, from which they have their fiefs. So that the Roman Empire has always had a certain number of both footmen and cavalry, paid for eternally 2c. I say this, therefore, in order to understand the Concilium correctly, namely, that it cannot be understood otherwise than of ordinary wars, because it must speak of Roman soldiers, in whom, according to the doctrine of St. Paul, many Christians had to be obedient, as St. Moritz with his companions, also Jovinianus, Gratianus, Valentinianus, Theodosius 2c. before they became emperors. But if it was right before baptism to serve the pagan emperors in war, why should it be wrong afterwards to serve Christian emperors after baptism?

046 If, in this place, Religio were not called the Christian faith, but monasticism? Then I would be imprisoned, and even after this Council I would have to crawl back into my cap, even if I wanted to do it differently; and I would not know how to find St. Peter in heaven, because he had been a fisherman before, and after the apostleship he again needed a fisherman's office, which he had left for the sake of Christ.

(47) It is now called monasticism, although at that time there were no orders, nor monasteries, nor monks, though it came to pass soon and quickly afterward. St. Anthony and his followers existed around the same time, whom they call the father and beginning of all monks. But at that time monk was called, which we now call hermit or hermitage, as also the Greek word Monachus is.

Solitarius, that is, a solitary, who dwells quite alone from the people, and lives in a wood or a wilderness, or otherwise alone. I know of no such monks now, nor has there been one for a thousand years; one would call the poor prisoners in towers and dungeons monks, who unfortunately are true monks, for they sit alone among the people. The monks of the papacy are more among the people, and less alone, neither are all the people. For what state or office in the world is more with and among the people, and less of the people, neither such monks? Unless the monasteries that are in the cities and in the countryside are not called built among the people, nor among the people.

Forty-eight: But let the Grammatica proceed to speak of the matter. If here Religio is called monasticism, which existed at the same time, why then does this Concilium condemn militia, that is, obedience to worldly authority, that monks should not be saved in such obedience? But this would still have to be suffered, that monasticism might be praised. But that the proper militia, on the other hand, should be condemned, as if St. Anthony could not serve the emperor in war with a good conscience, that is too much. For where would the emperor take people at last, if they all wanted to become monks, and pretend that they must not serve in war? Dear, say, how far is such a doctrine from a riot, especially if we taught so? And yet we know that the same monasticism mentioned above is not commanded by God, but obedience is commanded. If the monks wanted to flee from the people, they should flee honestly and truthfully, not leave a stink behind them; that is, they should not make other estates and offices stink with their fleeing, as if they were vain damned things, and their self-chosen monasticism should be vain balm. For so it is, when a man flees and becomes a monk, as if he said, Fie on thee, how these people stink, how damned is their estate; I will be blessed, and let them go to the devil. If Christ had also fled and become such a holy monk, who would have died for us, or done enough for us poor sinners? Perhaps the monks, with their fleeting austerity?

Forty-nine. It's true. St. John the Baptist
He also was in the wilderness, but not among the people: but afterward he came again among the people, having attained to the age of a man, and preached. Christ, like Moses on Mount Sinai, was forty days without men in the wilderness among the beasts, neither eating nor drinking, and came again among the people. Well then, let us take them for hermits and monks: nevertheless they both condemn not the rank of paid warriors, though they be not such warriors: but John saith unto them, Luc. 3:14: "Be content with your pay, and do neither violence nor wrong to any man." Christ went to the centurion of Capernaum to help his servant, who also undoubtedly served in the army [Matt. 8:10]. Nor doth Christ call him to leave such station, but praiseth his faith above all Israel. And St. Peter let Cornelius remain captain in Caesarea after his baptism, together with his servants, who were in the service of the Romans. How much more should St. Anthony, with his monks, not have challenged such an order of God with his new and own holiness, because he was a bad layman, quite unlearned, in no preaching office or church office. I do believe that he was great in the sight of God, and many more of his disciples, but his conduct is grievous and dangerous, in which he is preserved, as the elect are preserved in sins and other offences. But the example of his nature is not to be commended, but the example and doctrine of Christ and John.

(50) Now if Religio is called Christian faith or monasticism, it follows from this Concilio that militia, which was obedience in the time of the secular order, is to be considered disobedience to God, or a stinking obedience to human chosen monasticism. But St. Martin's legend says that Religio was called Christian faith. For when he wished to become a Christian, he surrendered his hereditary militia, in which his father had been and was now too old, and had his son Martin enrolled in his place, as the Roman Empire's commandments and ways required, and this was interpreted against him as if he had been timid before his enemies, so that he would flee and become a Christian, as that it nevertheless appears as if at that time the delusion had already arisen among the people (not without the preaching of some bishops) that militia was a dangerous, damned state to hold, and must flee from it who wants to serve God. For St. Martin was not long after Concilio Niceno, when he was a man of war under Julian.

051 If then we would keep or restore the council, we must flee into the wilderness after St. Anthony, make monks of emperors and kings, and say that they cannot be Christians nor blessed; or preach that they live in dangerous and stinking obedience, and serve not God. But if we will not keep this council, we must keep none at all. For one is as good as another, because the same Holy Spirit governs them all alike; and I do not wish to have the Concilium painted, nor in letters, but in deed and consequence. But I am almost fooled into thinking that the dear holy fathers did not set such an article, as they would certainly have spared the Emperor Constantine with it, who had delivered them from the tyrants, not with St. Anthony's monasticism, but with war and sword. It looks as if the other loose bishops have clicked it into place, or subsequently patched it underneath.

(52) The same Concilium provides that the Roman bishop shall, according to ancient custom, be charged with the suburban churches, as the bishop of Alexandria was with the churches in Egypt. I do not want to and cannot interpret what Kuburbioarias means, because it is not my word, except that it says, the churches that have been located in the foreign country around the Roman churches, like the churches in Egypt around the churches in Alexandria. But if anyone wishes to interpret this, I nevertheless understand that this Concilium does not give the bishop of Rome dominion over his surrounding churches, but commands him to see to it, and does the same, not as if it had to be jure divino, but out of old custom. But custom is not called keriptura sanetg, or God's word. About that it takes the churches in Egypt (as also from old custom) from the bishop to Rome, and, commands them to the bishop to Alexandria.

Likewise it is to be thought that the churches in Syria were commanded to the bishop of Antioch, or to that of Jerusalem, and not to the bishop of Rome, as they are farther from Rome, neither Alexandria nor Egypt.

053 Now if this council is to be valid in our churches, and to come into force, we must first condemn the bishop of Rome as a tyrant, and burn all his bulls and decrees with fire. For there is not a bull nor a decree in which he does not boast with great roar and dread that he is the supreme head and lord of all the churches on earth, to whom all that is on earth must be subject if it wishes to be saved. Which is nothing else but this: The Nicene Concilium is false, cursed, and damned, that it takes from me such glory above all things, and puts the bishop of Alexandria on a par with me. But the Turk and the Sultan have long since interpreted and taught such an article of the Concilii by destroying Alexandria, so that neither the pope nor we should not be concerned about it; so that we may learn that the articles of the Concilium are not all to be kept eternally the same as the articles of faith.

054 This Concilium enjoins that they who lust after themselves, against the great unpleasant heat of their flesh, shall not be admitted to the clergy, or to the ecclesiastical office. Again, it enjoins that bishops shall not have a wife about them, or dwell with them, unless it be mother, sister, wasen (that is, father's or mother's sisters), or such near friend. Here I do not understand the Holy Spirit at all in the Concilio. If they are not fit for the church office, who are lascivious because of unpleasant heat, and again, if they are also not fit, who take or have wives against such heat, according to St. Paul's counsel, 1 Cor. 7:2, what will that become? Shall a bishop or a preacher then be stuck in an unpleasant rut, and not be able to save himself from such a dangerous nature, neither by marriage nor by debauchery? For what can one command a man who has a wife, that he should have no other wives with him? Which is not fitting for laymen and husbands? So it would be proper with the mother, sisters, and wives, where the bishop has a household.

wife; should have no prohibition. Or has the Holy Spirit nothing else to do in the churches, but to entangle and burden his servants with impossible, dangerous, unnecessary laws?

55 The histories say that St. Paphnutius, the excellent man, in this council, had charged the bishops to forbid marriage, even to those who had taken wives before their ordination, and wanted to forbid them the obligation of marriage with their own wives. But he said that they should not do so, and said that it would also be chastity if a man were to require his wives to marry him. They say he hath received it. But these two decrees say that the bishops have continued and forbidden the wives badly. For there were also many unskilful, false bishops among the pious multitude and holy Concilio, such as the Arians with their mob (as the histories clearly show), who perhaps also did something to it; of which more hereafter. Let us stop a little from the conciliarities, and consider the fathers also; though St. Augustine misleads us, because he does not want to believe any of them (as said above), but has caught and forced all of them under the Scriptures, yet let us consider them also.

Whether the church may be reformed according to the Scriptures. 1)

(56) St. Cyprian, one of the oldest of the fathers, who was in Nicea long before the Council, at the time of the martyrs, and who was himself also an excellent martyr, taught and also firmly maintained that those who had been baptized should be baptized again among the heretics; he also persisted in this until his martyrdom, although he was strongly admonished by other bishops, and St. Cornelius, bishop of Rome, who was also martyred at the same time, would not keep company with him. Cornelius, bishop of Rome, who was also martyred at the same time, would not stand with him. After this, St. Augustine took great pains to excuse him, and in the end he needed such help that such error might be washed away by his blood, which he shed for the love of Christ. Thus St. Augustine speaks, and condemns St. Cyprian's doctrine of regeneration.

1) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

baptism, as then it is condemned for and for (as well as justly). But with Cyprian we would easily be satisfied, as in him Christ comforts us poor sinners well that his great saints must nevertheless also be men; as then St. Cyprian, the excellent man and holy martyr, stumbles more just rough pieces, of which now is not the time to speak.

But where shall we remain before the fathers, who have grounded such doctrine on St. Cyprian? You may read LeelosiuZt. Üi8tor. lib. 7. the first and other pages, what the excellent bishop Dionysius of Alexandria writes about it to the bishop Sixtum of Rome, and also says himself: it was done before, before the bishops in Africa, by great, excellent bishops, and decided in the Concilio of Jconio; therefore such an important trade is to be considered before one condemns them. In the Concilio Niceno, this article clearly states that the heretics, Paulianists or Photinians, should be baptized again. Augustine hard before the head, lūbro äs Husrssibus, because he had troubled himself with the Anabaptists, Donatists, very long and much; but he turns out with such words, for the sake of the Concilii Niceni decree: that it is to be believed that the Photinians have not kept the form of baptism, as other heretics did. Yes, who could also believe, since there is no word or 2) proof. For the Photiniani had no other gospel, neither had the whole church, therefore it is more to be believed, they used the common form. For the heretics always want to boast of the Scriptures. So rebaptism is right against St. Augustine and all of us, because the Nicene Concilium, and other Concilia and Fathers before it, agree with Cyprian.

(58) Now the Canons Apostolorum, the Apostles' writings, have gone out by the pressure of many, so that the church may again be well governed. Among them is this canon: the heretics' sacrament and baptism should not be considered anything, but they should be baptized again. And it is easy to count where the apostles have decreed this, that afterwards it came through the previous Fathers and Concilia (as Dionysius says above) up to St. Cyprianum, and from there to the Concilium at Nicea. For Cyprian was at Nicea before the Council. If the apostles have established this, then St. Cyprian is right, and St. Augustine is down with all Christendom, and we also with him who hold with him. For who will teach against the apostles? If the apostles have not set it, then such books, writers, and masters should all be drowned, and they should be found spreading, printing, and shouting such books under the apostles' names; they are also worthy to be believed in no other books nor things, because they always bring forward such books, which they themselves do not believe, and yet charge us with these letters: Concilia, Fathers, which a choirboy at Halberstadt might better shout to me, if it were only for the letters, since they alone deal with and fool us.

059 Now if St. Cyprian had such a rule of the apostles for himself, and the Concilium of Nicea, and others more, how shall we compare the fathers? The apostles with Cyprian want one to baptize again. St. Augustine, with the whole church after him, wants it to be wrong. Who meanwhile preaches to the Christians until such a rift is settled and compared? Yea, it is good to juggle with concilia and fathers, if one alfenzet with the letters, or always consumes concilium, as has now happened twenty years, and does not think where, however, the souls remain, which one is to feed with certain doctrine, as Christ says [Jn. 21:6]: kasee 0V68 M6N8.

60 I excuse St. Cyprian, first of all, because he has not been such an Anabaptist as ours are now. For he believes that heretics have no sacrament; therefore they must be baptized like other pagans, and he is mistaken in his heart that he does not rebaptize, but baptizes an unbaptized pagan. For he knows and holds of no rebaptism, but only one baptism. But our Anabaptists confess that with us and under the papacy baptism is right, but because it is given or received by unworthy men, it is not baptism.

St. Cyprian did not suffer, much less do.

(61) I will have this said for me by the holy martyr St. Cyprian, of whom I speak highly because of his person and faith. For doctrine is subject to the saying of St. Paul [1 Tim. 5, 20.]: Omnia probate 6te. But our business now is not what I say, but how to rhyme the fathers together, that we may be sure what and how to preach to poor Christians. For here the apostles and Cyprian disagree with St. Augustine and the church about baptism. If we are to follow St. Augustine, we must condemn the apostles with their rules, and the Concilium Nicenum with the previous fathers and concilia, together with St. Cyprian. And again, if St. Cyprian is right with the apostles, St. Augustine is wrong with the church. Who meanwhile preaches and baptizes until we become one in these things? And where are the Christians who died in time, and remained in such error? Is this to govern the churches according to the doctrine of the fathers? 1) And since the Papists boast of the Canons of the Apostles and Conciliarity with the Fathers against us, and since some of them are embodied in the spiritual law of Gratian, and if the dam should break, that some of these Canons and Conciliarities should be found heretical, as this one is of rebaptism, who could prevent the flood from overflowing and overflowing? and with its roar would cry out once: Ye lie in all that ye write, and say, and print, and speak, and cry: ye must not be believed a word, though ye pretend to concilia, and fathers, and apostles.

022 But though we gather from the fathers or conciliarities, they what they please, we what we please, and cannot become one, because the fathers themselves are not one, no more than the conciliarities: But who shall preach to the poor souls, which know not of such gathering and strife? Is this to feed Christ's sheep, when we ourselves know not whether it be grass or poison, hay or dung? And shall they meanwhile pam-and hang until [it] comes to an end, and the Concilium resolves. Oh, how badly Christ would have provided for his church if it were to happen this way. Nay, it must be otherwise, neither do we pretend from the councils and fathers, nor must there have been no church since the apostles' time; which is not possible. For there it is written, "I believe one holy Christian church," and, "I am with you unto the end of the world" [Matt. 28:20]. These words need not be wanting, nor should all Concilia and Fathers be wanting. The man must be called: Ego veritas; fathers and concilia should be called against him: Omni8 lomo mevāax, where they would be against each other.

(63) I do not say this for the sake of our people, whom I will show hereafter what the Concilia, the Fathers, and the Church are, if they do not know (for which God has protected them), but for the sake of those who do not think otherwise, because we have not read the Fathers and the Concilia. Although I have not read all of the Concilia, I do not want to read them all, nor do I want to waste so much time as I have tried, because I have read the four main Concilia almost well, and much better than all of them, that I know; I also want to be so presumptuous that, after the four main concilia, I want to consider the others all inferior, although I would consider them good, (hear me) some; the fathers, I hope, shall be well known to me, neither such criers, who fork out what they want, leaving the other, which they distort. Therefore we must do otherwise to the matter.

64 And what shall we fence? If we wish to compare the sayings of the fathers, let us take UaZwtor Keuteutmrur, who is exceedingly diligent in this work, and has long preceded us. For he also had such a challenge from the inequality of the fathers, and wished to remedy such a matter. And in my opinion he hath done better than we would. And you will not find so much in any Concilio, nor in all the Concilia, nor in any of the Fathers, as in the Book of Lantovtiarum. For the Concilia and the Fathers treat of some parts of Christian doctrine, but none treats them all as this man does, or at least most of them. But of the right articles, as fides et justificatio, he speaks too thinly and too weakly, although he praises the grace of God highly enough. So, as said above, we may have Gratianum work for us in the comparison of the Concilia, in which he almost endeavors, but is not so pure as NaZwtSr Lsnteutiarum. For he gives too much to the Roman bishop, and points everything to him. Otherwise, he might have done better to compare with the conciliar, as we could do now.

Whoever wants to see further how the dear holy fathers have become men, should read the booklet of D. Pomer, our pastor, about the 4 Oap. aä Ooriutllio8. Pomer, our pastor, about the 4 Oap. aä Ooriutllio8; from it he will have to learn that St. Augustin wrote right, Roli Ew ete. as it is said above, that he does not want to believe any of the fathers, because he has the Scriptures for himself. Dear Lord God, if the Christian faith should hang on men, and be based on the word of men, what should one believe in the Holy Scriptures? Or for what purpose has God given them? Then let us thrust them under the bench, and in their place lay the Concilia and Fathers alone on the desk. Or if the fathers were not men, where shall we men be saved? If they have been men, they will at times have thought, spoken, done, as we think, speak, do; but from this they must say (as we do) the dear benediction, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive." 2c. Especially because they have not such promise of the Spirit as the apostles, but must be the apostles' disciples.

66. if the Holy Ghost had been so foolish as to suppose, or to trust, that the Conciliarities and Fathers would do all things well, and not fail, he would have had no need to warn his church before them, that all things should be examined, and to see where straw, hay, and wood, should be built out of the ground, 1 Cor. 3:12, that he might prophesy, not secretly, nor feebly, but publicly and mightily, that there should be among the holy church builders of wood, of straw, of hay, of hay, that is, teachers, who yet remained on the ground, or foundation, and might be hurt by fire, but should be saved.

ten. This cannot be understood of the heretics. For they lay another foundation, but these remain on the foundation, that is, in the faith of Christ, become blessed and are called saints of God, and yet have hay, straw, and wood, which must be burned by the fire of the holy Scriptures, though without harm to their salvation, as St. Augustine speaks of himself: Lriars potsro, llaorotious of ero, I may err, but [a] heretic I will not become. Cause, heretics do not only err, but do not want to be taught, defend their error as right, and argue against the known truth, and against their own conscience.

(67) Of such St. Paul says, Titus 3:10, 11: "Avoid a heretic when he is admonished one or two times, and know that such a one is a sinner and sins autocatacritos," that is, one who willfully and knowingly wants to remain damned in error. But St. Augustine will gladly confess his error, and have it said to him. Therefore he cannot be a heretic, even if he were in error. So do all other saints, and gladly give their hay, straw, and wood into the fire, that they may remain on the ground of blessedness. As we also have done, and still do.

68 Therefore, because it cannot be otherwise in the fathers (I speak of the holy and good ones), where they build without writing, that is, without gold, silver, precious stones, but that they build wood, straw, and hay: therefore, according to the judgment of St. Paul, we must know how to make a distinction between gold and wood, between silver and straw, between precious stone and hay. According to the judgment of St. Paul, we must know how to distinguish between gold and wood, between silver and straw, between precious stones and hay, and not let ourselves be forced by the useless criers into thinking that gold and wood are one thing, silver and straw one thing, emerald and hay one thing, or ask them (if it were to be done) that they themselves first become so wise as to take wood for gold, straw for silver, hay for pearls. Otherwise they shall spare ours, and not think of such foolishness or childishness.

019 And yet this miracle of the Holy Ghost is to be noted unto us all, that he hath wrought wickedly to give all the books of the holy scriptures, both of the new testament, and of the old testament, out of the people of Abrahah alone, and by his seed unto the world, and hath not caused one to be written by us Gentiles, so little as he also chose the prophets and apostles from the Gentiles, as St. Paul says Rom. 3, 2: The Jews have the great advantage "that God's words are trusted in them", as also the 147th Psalm, v. 19: "He hath declared his words unto Jacob, and his judgments unto Israel; so hath he done unto no Gentile"; and Christ himself Joh. 4, 22: "We know that out of the Jews came salvation"; and Rom. 9, 4: "Unto them is the promise, the law, the fathers, and Christ" 2c.

Seventy and seventy: therefore we Gentiles ought not to hold the scriptures of our fathers as high as the holy scriptures, but a little lower. For they are the children and heirs; we are the sojourners and strangers, who have come to the children's table by grace, without all promise. Yea, we should humbly thank God, and desire no more with the heathen woman, but that we should be the little dogs that gather up the crumbs which fall from the lords' table [Matt. 15:27]. So let us go on, and let us lift up our fathers and ourselves like the apostles, not thinking that God would rather break us, because He did not spare the natural branches, Rom. 11:21, and Abraham's seed or heirs, because of their unbelief. Nor does the accursed abomination at Rome, even over the apostles and prophets, desire to have power to change the Scriptures to his liking. Therefore St. Augustine writes to St. Jerome (as reported above): "I do not fear, dear brother, that you would have your Scriptures kept like the books of the apostles and prophets; God forbid that you should desire such things.

(71) Neither is there any Concilium, nor Fathers, wherein the whole Christian doctrine may be found or learned. Nicenum alone says that Christ is truly God; Constantinople that the Holy Spirit is God; Ephesus that Christ is not two, but one Person; Chalcedon that Christ has not one, but two natures, as Godhead and humanity. These are the four great principal Concilia, and have nothing more than these four pieces, as we shall hear. But this is not yet the whole doctrine of Christian faith. St. Cyprian deals with how one should die firmly in the faith.

and suffering, and rebaptizes heretics, and also reproves evil customs and women. St. Hilarius defends the Concilium of Nicea, that Christ is the right God, and he recites a few psalms. St. Jerome praises virginity and the hermitage. St. Chrysostom teaches prayer, fasting, almsgiving, patience 2c. St. Ambrose has nevertheless much, but St. Augustine the most, therefore also Magister Sententiarum has the most from him.

Seventy-two: And, in sum, put them all together, both fathers and conciliarities, yet thou canst not gather the whole doctrine of the Christian faith out of them, though thou hast little faith in them. And where the holy Scriptures had not done and kept, the church would not have remained long for the sake of the Concilia and the Fathers. And for a sign: Whence do the fathers and conciliarities teach or do? Thinkest thou that they first invented it in their time, or that a new thing was always given them by the Holy Spirit? By what then was the church established before such conciliarities and fathers? Or were there no Christians before the conciliarities and fathers arose? Therefore we must speak differently of the churches and fathers, and look not at the letters, but at the understanding; and this is enough for the first part of this booklet, that we also take breath.

The other part [of the concilia].

Seventy-three First, Conciliarities. For the letters "Concilium" give us who are unintelligent an immeasurable amount of trouble, even more than the Fathers and the Church. But I do not want to be a judge or a master here, but to give my thoughts. To him who can do better, grace and good fortune be wished, amen. And take before me the saying of St. Hilarii äs ^rinitatö: Ux omisis äiesnäis sumsnäa 68t intelliZEntiL äiotorum, that is: He who would understand a speech must see why, or from what causes it was spoken. 8ie ex 6au8i8 nAonäi, 60Avo86untur aeta. Such also teaches natural reason, but itself wants to indicate it in a grosser way. When one peasant sues another: Dear judge, this man calls me a rogue and a knave. These words and letters, so bare, give the offence.

The defendant, however, comes and gives the reasons for such letters, and says: "My dear judge, he is a knave and a rogue, for he has been stolen from the city of N. with rods for the sake of his roguishness, and he has honestly asked through pious people that he not be hanged, and he will hand me over here in my hanse. Here the judge will understand the letters differently than before. As daily experience in the regiment teaches. For before the reason and cause of the speeches are known, they are letters or the cries of choirboys and the songs of nuns.

Seventy-four: So when Christ saith unto Peter, Whatsoever thou bindest on earth shall be made fast in heaven, and whatsoever thou loose shall be loosed; these letters the pope taketh, and leadeth thither into the land of the sleeping monkeys, and thus interpreteth them, Whatsoever I do in heaven and in earth is right: I have the keys of binding and loosing, all and all. Yea, if we had eaten turnips! 2c. But when the causes are considered, Christ is in this, that he speaketh of binding and loosing sins, because they are the keys of the kingdom of heaven, whither no man cometh but by the remission of sins; and no man is shut out from it, save he that is bound for his impenitent life. So that the words do not concern St. Peter's power, but the need of miserable sinners, or proud sinners. But the pope makes of such keys two thieves crowns and chests for all kings, and bags, bodies, honors, and goods for all the world. For he looketh on the letters like a fool, and regardeth not the causes.

75 So there are many sayings in the Scriptures which are contrary to each other according to the letter, but where the causes are shown, all is right. Hold also that all the lawyers and Medici also find much of this in their books, as I said above of the magistrate. And what is all man's nature but vain antilogiae, or vile things, till the things be heard? Wherefore my antilogists are excellent, fine, pious sows and asses, that gather my antilogies together, and leave the causes standing, yea, obscure them with diligence; even as if I could not also recite antilogiae out of their books, since they are are also not to be compared with some cause. But enough of this, for they are not worth so many words.

From the Concilio Niceno. 1)

76 We now take before us the Concilium of Nicea, which was held for such a cause: The praiseworthy emperor Constantine had now become a Christian, and had given peace to the Christians against the tyrants and persecutors, so with great, earnest faith and hearty opinion, that he also overcame his brother-in-law Licinium, to whom he had given his own sister Constantia, and had made her a secondary emperor, and expelled her from the empire, because, after much admonition, he would not cease to torture the Christians very shamefully.

(77) Now when the good emperor had made such peace with the Christians, and done them all good, he supported the churches as he always could, and was quite sure that he intended to make war with the Persians out of the empire. In such a beautiful peaceful paradise and happy time the old serpent comes, and awakens Arium, a priest of Alexandria, against his bishop, and wanted to bring up something new against the old faith, and also to be a man; He challenged his bishop's doctrine that Christ was not God, and too many priests and great learned bishops fell to him, and misfortune increased greatly in many countries, until Arius was allowed to boast that he was a martyr, and had to suffer for the truth from his bishop Alexandro, who did not let him have it well, and wrote shameful letters against him in all countries.

78) When these things came before the pious emperor, he acted as a very wise prince, and wished to quench the flames before the fire increased; he wrote a letter to both of them, bishop Alexandrum and priest Arium, admonishing them so kindly, and also so earnestly, that it could not be written better; showing them how he had made peace in the kingdom for the Christians with great trouble, and that they should now make strife among themselves, which would be a great vexation to the heathen, and might fall again from the faith (as was done.)

1) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

and he himself complains), and he would thus be prevented from going against the Persians. Summa, it is a humble Christian letter, written by such a great emperor to these two men. Methinks it fei too much humility. For I know my rough pen, so that I could not have brought such a humble writing out of my inkwell, especially if I had been emperor, and such an emperor.

Seventy-nine: but such a letter was of no avail. Arius had now gained a large following, and wanted to go headlong against his bishop; the pious emperor also did not desist, sending a bodily embassy, an excellent, famous bishop in all the world, called Osius of Corduba in Hispania, to the two in Alexandria and all Egypt, to settle the matter. This did not help, and the fire continued to burn as if it were a forest. Then the good emperor Constantine did the last thing, and had the best and most illustrious bishops gathered from all the countries, commanded that they be brought together with the empire's asses, horses, and mules to Nicea, and wished to bring matters to peace through them. Then there came together many fine bishops and fathers, and especially famous, Jacobus of Nisibin, and Paphnutius of Ptolomaide, bishops who had suffered great tortures and done miraculous signs at Licinio. But there were also among them, as dung among the pepper, some Arian bishops.

80 The emperor was now happy, and hoped for a good end to the matter; he considered them all honest and beautiful. So some of them went to the emperor and brought complaints to him about what one bishop had against the other, and asked for the emperor's judgment. He rejected them, for he was not concerned about the bishops' quarrels, but wished to have this article judged by Christ, and had not summoned the concilium for the sake of their quarrels. But since they did not desist, he ordered them all to be brought to him, and read none of them, but threw them into the fire. But he rebuked them with such kind words: he could not be their judge, whom God had set over him as judges, and admonished them to take up the main matter. Well, let this be to me a wise, gentle, patient prince; another would have been at such bi-and pushed the barrel into a heap. But still he showed his opinion by burning the notes, regardless of their episcopal dignity, and thus admonished them of their childish things, because they were required for the sake of a greater cause.

81 When the concilium began, he also sat down in the midst of the bishops on a chair which was lower than any of the bishops' chairs. The bishop of Rome, Sylvester, was not there, but (as some say) he had sent two priests thither. When the bishop of Antioch, Eustathius (who sat at the head of the council), had thanked and praised the emperor for such a boon, the doctrine of Arii was publicly read (for it seems that he himself was not there, because he was neither a bishop nor an embassy), how Christ was not God, but created and made by God, as is further stated in the Histories. Then the holy fathers and bishops got up from their chairs in displeasure, and tore the notes to pieces, saying, "This is not right. And so Arius was also publicly condemned with the unjust words of the Conciliar. So grievous was it to the fathers, and so grievous to them, to hear such blasphemy of Arius. And all the bishops signed such condemnation, even the Arian bishops with them, though from a false heart, as was afterwards proved; except two bishops from Egypt, who did not sign. So the emperor left the concilium of the day, and he himself and the concilium also wrote letters to all the world of this bargain. And the emperor Constantine was heartily glad that the matter was settled and accomplished, and was very friendly to them, especially to those who had been martyred.

82 From this it is clear why the Council met and what they were to do, namely, to preserve the old article of faith, that Christ is the true, true God, against the new cleverness of Arii, who, according to reason, wanted to falsify this article, even to change and condemn it; for this he himself is condemned. For the Concilium did not invent or establish this article anew, as if it had not existed before in the Church, but against the new heresy of Arii. As is evident from the fact that the fathers were offended, and tore up the note, confessing that they had previously learned and taught differently in their churches from the time of the apostles. For where would the Christians have remained, who before this Council had believed for more than three hundred years from the time of the apostles, and had worshipped and called upon the dear Lord Jesus as a true God, and died for it, and allowed themselves to be miserably martyred?

(83) I must therefore declare this here. For the pope's hypocrites have fallen into such gross folly that they do not think otherwise, that the Conciliarities have power and right to establish new articles of faith and to change the old ones. This is not true. And such a piece of paper shall we Christians also tear up. No concilia have done it, nor can do it. For the articles of faith must not grow on earth through the concilia, as from a new secret inspiration, but must be publicly given and revealed by heaven through the Holy Spirit, otherwise they are not articles of faith, as we shall hereafter hear. This Concilium at Nicea (as I said) did not invent this article, nor did it establish anew that Christ is God, but it was done by the Holy Spirit, who came publicly from heaven upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost, and transfigured Christ through the Scriptures as a true God, as He had promised the apostles. From the apostles it abode, and came unto this council, and evermore unto us: and it shall abide unto the end of the world, as he saith, "I am with you unto the end of the world."

84 And if we had no more to defend this article than this Council, we would be in a bad way. And I did not want to believe the Council itself, but to say, "They were men. But the evangelist St. John and St. Paul, Peter, together with the other apostles, these hold fast, and stand for us for good reason and defense, as it is revealed to them by the Holy Spirit, publicly given from heaven, of whom the churches had it before this Council, and the Council also of them. For both of them, before the Concilio, being Arius began, and in the Concilio, and after the Concilio, he was hard with the Scriptures, especially with St. John's Gospel, and sharply disputing, as Athanasii and Hilarii's books testify. Thus also Tripart. lib. 5. o. 29 speaks: The faith is founded in Nicea by the apostles' Scriptures. Otherwise, where the holy Scriptures of the prophets and apostles that, 1) the mere words of the Concilii would accomplish nothing, and their judgment nothing. Therefore this article of the divinity of Christ is the chief part of this Concilii; yea, it is the Concilium altogether, as for this cause it is called, and at this day (as I have said) left one from another.

85 But another day, when the emperor Constantinus was not reported, they met again, and discussed other matters concerning the outward temporal government of the churches; among which, no doubt, were the notes which Constantinus had previously thrown into the fire, and did not wish to be a judge. Therefore, they themselves had to come together and settle these matters without the emperor. For the several parts of the matter are a real quarrel among the clergy, so that there should not be two bishops in one city. Item, that no bishop from a small church should seek a larger one. Item: that clerics, or ecclesiastics, should not leave their church, and sneak through other churches from time to time. Item: that no one should consecrate another bishop's persons without his knowledge and will. Item: that no bishop should accept one who has been expelled by another. Item: that the bishop of Jerusalem shall retain his ancient preeminence of worthiness above others, and of gossip 2) more. Who can take such things for articles of faith? And what can be preached of them in the church to the people? What is the church's or the people's business? One would learn from this, as from a history, that at that time there have been everywhere in the churches also wanton, wicked, disorderly bishops, priests, and clerics, and so on. and people who asked more for honors, power, and good, neither for

1) "that" - would not be there, would not hinder, would not enforce. Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. V, 251, s 27; 66, s 37 and the note there.

GOD or His kingdom, which one has thus to resist.

86 For it is easy to reckon that Constantine did not bring this council together for the sake of such things, or else he would have done so before Arius began his lamentation. What would he have had to worry about how such things were to be kept? because all this was to be governed by the bishops among themselves, each in his own diocese, with his church, and had already been done, as the articles themselves report. It would also be a sin and a disgrace to gather such a large council for the sake of such small matters, since reason, given by God, is sufficient to regulate such external matters, so that the Holy Spirit is not needed for this, who is to transfigure Christ, and not to deal with such matters, which are subject to reason. To say, then, that all that pious Christians do, even when they eat and drink, is to be called all that the Holy Spirit does. Otherwise, for the sake of doctrine, the Holy Spirit must have other things to do, and not such works, which are subject to reason.

(87) Neither were they all pious in this council, not only Paphnutii, Jacobi, and Eustathii 2c. For there are 17 Arian bishops who were held in high esteem, even though they had to pretend and pretend before the others. The History of Theodoret says that there were 20 articles; Ruffinus makes it 23. Whether the Arians, or others with them, added some afterwards, or took them down, or put others (for the article that St. Paphnutius is said to have received from the wives of the priests is not among them), I cannot say. But this I know well, that they have long since almost all died, and are buried in the books and decayed, nor can they ever rise again, as Constantine meant and prophesied with the work, when he threw them into the fire and burned them. For they are not kept, neither can they be kept. They were hay, straw, and wood (as St. Paul says) built upon the ground; therefore the fire consumed them in time, as other temporal, perishable things perish. But if they had been articles of faith, or the commandment of God, they would have remained, as the article of the divinity of Christ.

(88) However, of the wooden articles, one small block has remained smoldering, namely, Easter Day. We do not quite have the same article (as the Mathematici or Astronomi tell us), because the same day or Aequinoctium is far different in our time, neither in that time, and our Easter is often held too late in the year. In the past, soon after the apostles, quarrels began over Easter, and the bishops fought and quarreled over such a small, unnecessary matter, so that it was a sin and a disgrace. Some wanted to keep it with the Jews on one day, according to the law of Moses. The others, so that they would not be Jewish, wanted to keep it on Sunday. For the bishop of Rome, Victor, at one hundred and eighty years before this Council, who was also a martyr, condemned all the bishops and churches in Asia for not keeping Easter with him. Thus temporally the Roman bishops grasped at majesty and violence. But Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons in France, who had known one of St. John the Evangelist's disciples, Polycarpum, punished him and put an end to the matter, so that Victor had to satisfy the churches.

89. therefore Constantinus also had to take care of these matters, and help arbitrate in the Concilio, and wrote out that the feast of Easter should be kept the same in all the world, ImZv Iripart. lib. 9. oap. 38. pultRerrinig... Now, again, there should be a reformation, that the calendar should be corrected, and the Easter should be set right. But no one should do this, for the high majesties, emperors and kings, must at the same time send out a command to all the world as to the time from which Easter Day should henceforth be observed. Otherwise, if one country began to hold its fairs, fairs, and other secular affairs at the same time, the people of one country would have to come to the fairs of another country at the wrong time, and all things would be in a state of chaos and confusion. It would be fine, and also easy to do, where the high majesties wanted to do it, because everything has already been finely worked out by the astronomers, and only the tender or commandment is lacking. However, we hold the smoldering wood from the Niceno Con cilio, that the Easter day remains on a Sunday, it schuckele meanwhile the time, as it can. For they call it l'esta modilia, I call it Schuckelfest, since Easter Day changes annually with its appendant feasts, now coming early, now late in the year, and not remaining on a certain day like the other feasts.

(90) The reason for such a change in the feasts is that the old fathers (as I have said) wanted to have Easter at the beginning, around the time of Moses, namely in the full moon of March, next to the Equinox or Aequinoctio, and yet they did not want to celebrate Easter at all, or to celebrate it with the Jews on the full moon, but as Christians they let the law of Moses go, and took the Sunday after the full moon of March. So it happened in the next year 1538, the Jews held their Easter on the Saturday after Invocavit, as our church calls it, that is, five weeks before we held our Easter. Now the Jews laugh at this, and mock us Christians, as we do not know how to keep Easter properly, and thus strengthen themselves in their unbelief. Our people are now disturbed by this, and would like to see the calendar corrected by their high majesties, because it is not possible, much less advisable, without their help.

011 But it hath come to pass, in my opinion, as Christ saith, Matt. 9, Where a man mendeth an old garment with new cloth, the rent is made worse; and where he putteth must into old evil vessels, the old ripeness is broken, and the must is spilled. They want to keep a part of the old law of Moses, namely, that one should observe the full moon of March; that is the old coat; after that they do not want to be subject to the same full moon day (as Christians, freed by Christ from the law of Moses), but have the following Sunday for it; that is the new lappet on the old coat. Therefore the eternal strife and the eternal strife have made so much substance in the church, and must make it until the end of the world, that the books have no measure nor end. For this cause Christ hath also ordained, and caused it to come to pass; because he hath always shewed his power in weakness, and hath taught us to know our infirmities.

022 How much better had they let the law of Moses be utterly dead from the paschal feast, and kept nothing of the old garment! For Christ, to whom it was directed, by his suffering and resurrection, gave it up purely, killed and buried it forever, tore the veil in the temple, and afterwards broke and destroyed Jerusalem with its priesthood, principality, law, and everything. For this they should have noted the day of the Passion, the grave and the resurrection, counted according to the course of the sun, and set it in the calendar on a certain day, as they did with the Chrismation, the New Year, the holy kings, the light mass, and the Nariah. nnunoiationis Nariae, St. John's Day, and other festivals, which they call certain festivals, and not Schuckel festivals, then one would have known annually when Easter Day, and the festivals connected with it, should come, without such great trouble and disputation.

(93) Yea, saith thee, Sunday ought to be honoured for the resurrection of Christ, which therefore is called Dominica this, and Pascha day should be set thereon, because Christ rose again after the Sabbath (which we now call Saturday). It is well an argument that moved them, but because aios Dominien is not called Sunday, but the Lord's day, why should not all the days on which Easter day would have come be called aiem Dominienm, the Lord's day? Is not Christ's day also called this Dominion, the Lord's day, that is, in which the Lord's special work, as his birth, is celebrated, which does not come every year on Sunday? nor is it called Christ's day, that is, the Lord's day, even if it comes on a Friday, because it has a certain letter in the calendar, just after the sun's course. In the same way, Easter Day would have had a certain letter in the calendar; it would have come on Friday or Wednesday, as is the case with Christ Day. Thus we would have been well rid of the law of Moses with its full March moon. Just as it is not asked now whether the moon is full or not around Christmas Day, and we remain without counting the moon by the days according to the course of the sun.

94) And whether one pretends, because the same day or oHuinootium (as the astronomers say) goes of its place, but the years in the calendar

The longer the more, the farther the same day would come from the appointed day of Easter, as it comes the farther from Philippi and Jacobi and other feasts. What do we Christians ask of it, if our Easter were to come around Philippi and Jacobi (which I hope will not happen before the end of the world)? And still further, we keep Easter every day with the preaching and faith of Christ. And it is enough that Easter is held once a year on a special day for the public, sensitive remembrance; not only so that the story of the resurrection can be told there more diligently before the people, but also for the sake of the season, so that the people may be guided by it in their dealings and business, as the seasons of Michaelmas, Martinmas, Catharinemas, Johnmas, Petermas, and Paulmas 2c. are held.

95 But this was omitted long ago, and from the beginning, that we could not do it, because the fathers did it not. The old garment has always remained with its great tear, so it may remain so until the last day. But it is now at the end. For if the old coat has been mended and torn for 1400 years, it may be mended and torn for another hundred years. For I hope all things shall come to an end. And if the Easterners have now mended for fourteen hundred years, let them mend for the rest of the short time, because no one wants to do it, and those who would like to, cannot do it.

(96) The only reason I am doing such rambling and unnecessary talk is that I want to indicate my opinion as to whether, in time, some of the revivals would, of their own accord, dare to celebrate Easter in a different way than we do now. And I think that if the Anabaptists had been so learned in astronomy that they had understood this, they would have gone through it with their heads, and (as is the way of the Rotten) would also have wanted to introduce something new into the world, and keep Easter Day differently from the rest of the world. But because they were unlearned in the arts, the devil could not use them for such an instrument or tool.

97 Therefore this is my counsel, that the paschal feast be let go and kept as it now goeth and is kept, and let the old coat be mended and rent (as I have said), and let the paschal feast be shuffled hither and thither until the latter day, or until the monarchs change it with one accord and at the same time, considering this cause.

98 For it will not break our leg, and St. Peter's little ship will not suffer distress, because it is neither heresy nor sin (as the ancient fathers, out of ignorance, held it to be, and were disobedient and broken up about it), but badly an error or solöcism in astronomy, more serviceable to the temporal government than to the church. If the Jews mock us about this, as if we did it out of ignorance, we rather mock them again, because they keep their Easter so stiffly and in vain, and do not know that Christ fulfilled it all 1,500 years ago, and that he has annulled it. For we do it willingly, knowingly, and not out of ignorance. We would know very well how to keep Easter according to the law of Moses; neither do they know it better. But we will not, neither shall we. For we have the Lord over Moses and over all things, who saith [Matt. 12:8], "The Son of man is Lord over the sabbath." How much more is he Lord over Easter and Pentecost, which are in the law of Moses less neither the Sabbath, which are in the tables of Moses, Easter and Pentecost apart from the tables of Moses? For this we have St. Paulum, who bequeaths that one should not be bound to the feasts, festivals, and anniversaries of Moses, Gal. 4, 10. Col. 2, 16.

99. Therefore it is and shall be in our power and liberty to keep Easter when we will; and though we make Friday Sunday, and again, yet it shall be lawful, provided it be done by the Majesties and Christians (as I have said) with one accord. For Moses is dead, and buried by Christ. And days or times shall not be lords over Christians, but Christians are free lords over days and times, to set them as they will, or as they please. For Christ hath made all things free, having raised up Moses, without our willing to let it remain as it is now, because there is no driving, no error, no sin.

nor heresy, and do not want to change anything without necessity, or out of their own individual thirst, for the sake of others who are equally attached to such Easter with us. For without Easter and Pentecost, without Sunday and Friday, we know how to be saved, and for the sake of Easter, Pentecost, Sunday, Friday, we cannot be condemned, as St. Paul teaches us.

100 And coming again to the Concilio, I say, that we hold the block of Niceno Concilio too much, and afterwards the pope with his church hath made of it not only gold, silver, and precious stones, but also a ground, that is, an article of faith, without which we cannot be saved; and they all call it a commandment and obedience of the church, that they may be much worse than the Jews. For the Jews have for themselves the text of Moses, commanded by God at that time; these have nothing but their own conceit for themselves, and go on and want to make a new coat out of the old rags of Moses, pretending to keep Moses, and yet their thing is a mere poem and dream of Moses, who has been dead so long, and, as the Scripture says, buried by the Lord himself (that is, by Christ), that no man has found his grave; and they want to make Moses appear alive before our eyes; not seeing that, as St. Paul Gal. 6, 2. says, if they will keep A piece of Moses, they must also keep the whole of Moses. Therefore, if they consider the full month of March necessary to keep at Easter, as a piece of his law, they must also keep the whole law of the paschal lamb, and become bad Jews, and keep with the Jews a bodily paschal lamb; if not, they must leave it all, even the full month with the whole of Moses, or ever not consider it necessary to salvation, as an article of faith; as I consider that the fathers in this Concilio (especially the best) have done.

101 Thus we have that this Concilium has primarily dealt with this article, that Christ is true God, therefore it is also required together, therefore it is and is called a Concilium. Besides this, they have acted upon some accidental, bodily, external, and temporal things, which are to be regarded as worldly, not to be compared to the articles of faith, nor to be held as an eternal right (for they are not to be regarded as a law).

have passed away and decayed), but the Concilium has had to perform such bodily acts as were accidental and necessary in their time, even with those that no longer concern us in our time, nor are they possible or useful to consider. And as a sign, even if one of them is wrong and unjust, that heretics should be baptized again, it is otherwise set by the true fathers themselves, and not patched up by the Arians or the loose bishops who changed it. So also the Concilium of the Apostles at Jerusalem, after the principal part, had to pay some accidental, external articles, as of the blood, strangled, idolatrous sacrifices, as in their time necessity; but not thinking that it should remain an eternal right, as an article of faith, in the church, for it is fallen. And why would we not also consider the same Concilium, how it is to be understood, from the causes which have enforced it.

Of the Apostles Concilio. 1)

012 And this was the cause. The Gentiles, who were converted by Barnabam and Paul, had received the Holy Ghost by the gospel, as well as the Jews, and yet were not under the law, as the Jews were. Then the Jews pressed hard, saying that the Gentiles must be circumcised, and called to keep the law of Moses, or they could not be saved. These were hard, sharp, and severe words: they could not be saved without the law of Moses and circumcision. And these things were done before others of the Pharisees, which believed on Christ, Acts 15. 015 Then came the apostles together with the elders together for this cause, and when they had much and sharp disputing, St. Peter stood up, and preached the mighty and beautiful sermon, Acts 15:7-11. 15, 7-11: "Dear brethren, you know how God chose that through my mouth the Gentiles should hear the word of the gospel and believe; and God, the heart-preacher, bore witness to them and gave them the Holy Spirit, just as he did to us, and made no distinction between us and them, and purified their hearts through faith. Why then do you tempt God

With the putting of the yoke upon the necks of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we have been able to bear? but we believe to be saved by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, even as they also were saved."

103 This sermon is almost as if St. Peter were angry and unhappy at the harsh words of the Pharisees, saying that they cannot be saved unless they circumcise themselves and keep the law of Moses, as was said above. And again he speaketh hard and sharp words, saying, Know ye that the Gentiles have heard the word by me, and have believed, as Cornelius did with his own. And for a sign ye murmured against me, and reproached me, because I went unto the Gentiles, and converted them, and baptized them, Acts 10 and 11. 10 and 11: How then have ye forgotten these things, and have laid upon the Gentiles such burdens as neither our fathers nor we ourselves could bear? What is it but to tempt God, if we lay upon others an impossible burden, which we ourselves cannot bear, any more than they can, especially if you know that God gave them the Spirit without such a burden, and made us like them, since we also received the same Spirit, not for the merit of the burden, but by grace, as did our fathers. For since we were not able to bear the burden, we deserved much more disgrace than grace, which we were obliged to bear, as we had undertaken to do.

104 This is the substance and main matter of this Council, namely, that the Pharisees, contrary to the word of grace, would establish the works or merits of the law as necessary to salvation. This would have nullified the word of grace, together with Christ and the Holy Spirit. Therefore St. Peter fights and curses so hard against it, and wants to be saved badly, without any works, by the grace of Jesus Christ alone. Not content with this, he may also be so bold as to say that all their forefathers, both patriarchs and prophets, and the whole holy church in Israel, were saved by the grace of Jesus Christ alone; and he condemns as tempters of God all those who want to be saved by other means, or who still want to be saved. I mean, this is called preaching, and the barrel

...and struck the ground. Should not this heretic be burned, who rejects all good works, and considers grace and faith alone to be enough for salvation, and this by all the saints and ancestors from the world? We must now be called heretics and devils, who teach nothing else than this sermon of St. Peter and this Conciliar Decree, as all the world now knows, better than the Pharisees knew, whom St. Peter here chides.

(105) But St. Peter is far above us, and yet too strange, that he preacheth not only the grace of Christ unto salvation, which every man is glad to hear, but that he saith that neither they themselves nor their forefathers were able to bear such a burden, which in plain language is so much as to say, We apostles, and who we are, together with our forefathers, patriarchs, prophets, and all the people of God, have not kept God's commandment, and are sinners and damned. For he does not speak of the blood sausage or black galreden, but of the law of Moses, and says that no one has kept it or may keep it, as Christ John 7:19: "No one among you keeps the law." That is (methinks) the law rightly preached to damnation, and made himself a damned sinner with it. Whence, then, does the supposed heir of the See of St. Peter come to call himself Lanetissimum, and to raise up saints whom he wills for their works, not for the grace of Christ? And where are the monks, who can bear much more, neither the burden of the law, that they also sell their remaining holiness? Such whimsical Peter's head we have not. For we must not think the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and holy church sinners, but must also call the pope the most holy, that is, Lanetum Lanetorum, ick 68t, (Mri8tum).

(106) But St. Peter is worthy of a very gracious and honest absolution, and is no longer to be thought strange. For in this very great article he preaches, first, the law that we are all sinners; second, that the grace of Christ alone makes us blessed, and also the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and the whole holy church from the beginning, all of whom he makes sinners with himself and condemns. Thirdly, before the Concilium becomes Nicea, He teaches that Christ is the true God. For he says that all the saints must be damned unless they are saved by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. To give grace and salvation, as a Lord, he must be a true God, who can take away sin by grace, and death and hell by salvation; which no creature can do, except the 8an6ti88imu8 of Rome, but without the harm of St. Peter's preaching. Fourthly, he that holdeth otherwise, and teacheth Christians to be saved, or to obtain grace, by the law, or by his own works, is a tempter of God.

017 Let him who will interpret this burden, that it is the law of Moses and circumcision alone, and not the ten commandments or good works. Of this I am well content. If thou canst keep the ten commandments more easily than the ceremonies of Moses, go and be holier than St. Peter and St. Paul; I am so weak in the ten commandments that it seems to me that all the ceremonies of Moses should be much easier for me to keep if the ten commandments did not weigh me down. But now is not the time to dispute about this; there is plenty of dispute elsewhere and elsewhere. But this also [reason] will have to judge and confess, that [the] ten commandments, or works of the ten commandments, are not, nor may be called, the grace of JESUS CHRIST, but must be and be called something altogether different. Now here St. Peter saith, that we must be saved by the grace of Jesus Christ alone; which grace cannot be received and retained with hands, much less with the works of hands, but with faith in the heart. This is certainly true.

058 And it is marvelous to see that St. Peter, who as an apostle had command and power, together with other apostles, to set forth anew this article, wherefore they are also called the foundation of the church, yet goes behind, and introduces the holy former church of God, of all the patriarchs and prophets from the beginning, and says this much: It is not a new doctrine, for thus our forefathers and all the saints have taught and believed. What dare we then To teach something different or better, without tempting God with it, and misleading and weighing down the consciences of the brethren? This, I say, is the substance or main thing of this Concilii, wherefore it is together-

And if any man ask or come, it is concluded therewith, and all things are made ready. But the priests do not look at this main part and pay no attention to it, and look at the other four parts that James adds: blood, strangled things, sacrifices to idols, and fornication. For they desire to strengthen their tyranny therefrom, and pretend: Because the church hath changed such articles, they also desire to have power to change the articles of faith and concilia; that is, we are the church, may sit and do what we please. Do you hear, Pabst, you are a rough ass, yes, you are a foul-mouthed pig.

109. The article of this Concilii hath not fallen nor been changed, but hath always remained, even from the beginning, as St. Peter saith here, and shall remain unto the end of the world. For holy men have always remained for ever, who have been saved by the grace of Christ alone, and not by the law. As then also under the devil of the papacy the text and faith of the gospel, of baptism, of the sacrament, of the keys, and of the name of Jesus Christ 2c. remained, although the pope with his accursed lies raged against it and shamefully deceived the world. As it is said of the Nicene Council, that its decree was before and remained after. For the decrees of true councils must always remain, just as they always remained before the main articles, for which reason they were and are called councils.

010 But what shall we say here in this Conciliar of the Apostles, when St. James hath expounded the four things, blood, things strangled, things sacrificed unto idols, and fornication? Is not the Concilium contrary to itself, and the Holy Ghost at variance with it? For the two sayings are manifestly and palpably contrary to each other: Not to lay up the burden of the law of Moses, and yet to lay it up. And if it were desired to be sophistical, it is not spoken in the Concilio of the whole law, but of parts, of which some may be charged, and some not charged; it is not so. For St. Paul, Gal. 5:3, casts out: He that keepeth one piece of the law is guilty of keeping it altogether. And this is just as much as if he knew himself to be guilty of it altogether, or else he would not observe it. And if a new rag be found on an old skirt, and a new skirt be found on an old skirt...

And the breach shall be worse. And it is evident that these things are in the law of Moses, and nowhere else in the laws of the nations. What else would have been necessary to interpret these things to the Gentiles, when they had been accustomed to them before, but their law of the land? How then shall we put them together, no law, and all law?

111 Therefore, if we cannot rhyme it together, we must leave St. James with his article, and keep St. Peter with his principal article, for the sake of which this Council is held. For without St. Peter's article no man can be saved. But Cornelius and the Gentiles, whom St. Peter baptized with him, became holy and blessed before St. James came with his article 2c., as St. Peter preaches in this Concilio. Above I have also inquired whether one may with a good conscience let such pieces be forfeited, because the Holy Spirit governs this Concilium, and sets all such things. But this dispute is much sharper, whether the Council is at variance with itself and with itself. And so, just as they want to take away an impossible burden from us, they put a still more impossible burden on us, that we should do nothing and everything at the same time. But now, because it has fallen, we have done well, and remain with the one part, with St. Peter's Article, that is, with the right Christian faith.

112) Fornication, the fourth part of the Article of St. James, has not fallen, although twenty years ago the Curtisans and damned lords had already begun to consider fornication not a mortal sin, but a daily sin, and to say, Natura petit exitum. As the holiest people in Rome still hold. And this very article should have caused the blind leaders to do so, because St. James puts fornication among the three forfeited pieces from which it was taken: If the prohibition of blood, and of things strangled, and of things sacrificed unto idols, is no more valid, neither is the prohibition of fornication any more valid, since it is placed with the three pieces, and is otherwise a natural and human work. Let them go; they are worth nothing better.

I will speak my mind on this, but another will do better. Now it is often said that one should look at the Concilia and also keep them according to the main article, which is the cause of the

For that, and there the Concilium is substantialiter, the right body or corpus of the Concilii, according to which everything else is to be directed and sent, as a garment is sent according to the corpus that wears it or has it; if not, it is taken off, and thrown full, it is no longer a garment. But there can be no concilium (nor can there be any assembly, be it a Diet or a Chapter), if the main things are arranged. There are incidental little side deals, one or two, that also want to be mended or done. As in the Concilio Niceno, when it was established that Christ was the true God, the outward quarrels of Easter Day and the quarrels of the apes took place. So here also St. Jacob's article is found after the main article of St. Peter.

(114) Therefore it is the final opinion and judgment of all the apostles and of the Council, that one must be saved without law or burden of law, but only by the grace of Jesus Christ; and when St. Peter, St. Paul, and their part had obtained this judgment, they were glad and well satisfied. For after such a judgment they had labored and contended against the Pharisees and Jews, who believed, and yet wished to keep the law [Acts 15:13]. That St. James now adds his article to this, they can well suffer, because such is not laid down as law or law's burden; as your: also the letter of the Concilii reports (Apost. 15, 28. 29.): Nihil oneris, we do not want you to have any

Lay up a burden, only that ye keep yourselves from blood 2c. Yes, they might well have suffered that St. James had added more pieces, as of essays or the like, as without this the ten commandments remain. But such shall not be a law nor a burden, they say, but only necessary things. But if burden is no more burden, it is good to bear; and if law is no more law, it is good to keep, as the ten commandments. How much more, then, is it in the ceremonies, especially when they are taken away, or kept a very little. Of this more elsewhere. For if the pope would have us take from his burden that they need not be laws, we would easily obey him, especially if he kept a little of them, and kept the multitude. So now St. James, with his article suffer the mind that St. Peter's article of grace, without laws, remain pure and firm, and rule without the law alone.

115 But we also want to see the causes of this side deal with St. Jacob, so that we may fully understand this concilium. The law of Moses was born unto the Jews, inborn, sucked in, imbibed, and imbibed from their youth, that it had almost become their nature, as St. Paul, Gal. 2:15, saith, "We are Jews by nature," that is, born of Moses. We are Jews by nature," (that is,) born of Moses: for he speaks of the law, and not of birth only; wherefore they could not bear to be compared to the Gentiles, when they were scattered abroad among the Gentiles, seeing the Gentiles eat blood, and things strangled, and things sacrificed unto idols, [Acts 15:29] and yet glorying in God's people, or Christians. This moved St. Jacob to prevent such an outrage, so that the Gentiles would not too brazenly abuse their freedom in defiance of the Jews, but would do so carefully, so that the Jews, who were so deeply immersed in the law, would not be thrown before their heads and eat the Gospel. For, dear God, one should have patience with sick and erring people; even as we drunken Germans are sometimes wise, and say: A drunken man shall give way to a cartload of hay. For in sick people no one can become a knight, and in the unwise no one can become a master.

016 Nevertheless Jacob made it very clean, and left all the law of Moses concerning sacrifices, and all other things, which they had to keep at Jerusalem, and in the land; and took only the four things before him, wherein the Jews were vexed among the heathen without Jerusalem. For the Jews, being scattered among the nations, had to see the ways of the nations, to dwell with them, and sometimes to eat with them. And it was very grievous, and also unjust, to set before a Jew a sausage to look at, a rabbit in black, and a speech, and a sacrifice made to idols, if I knew that he could not bear it, and that he should understand it in spite of himself. For in this I do as much as if I said, Hear, O Jew, though I could bring thee to Christ, if I did not eat the sausage, nor set it before thee, yet will I not do it; but with the sausage I will put thee off from Christ.

and blow them to hell. Would that be a kind, I will be silent, Christian thing to do? Ought not every man often to hold his peace, and to leave another in good stead, when he seeth and knoweth that to speak and to do so would be hurtful, especially where it is not against God? Now at that time the heathen were fierce against the Jews, and very proud, as they were their lords; and the Jews were displeased, as they alone were God's people, as many histories mightily testify.

(117) Therefore this good counsel of St. Jacob was the most excellent means to peace, and even to salvation for many, because the Gentiles, having obtained the grace of Christ without law and merit, showed themselves again to be beneficial to the Jews in very few things, as to the sick and erring, to come to the same grace. For since it did the Gentiles no harm in the sight of God, whether they feasted on blood, suffocated things, or sacrificed things to idols in public outward usages, since they were free in conscience through the grace of all this, and for the sake of the Jews' benefit and salvation let their defiance stand, and otherwise, in the absence of the Jews, could eat and drink what they lusted for without any vexation, and the Jews were equally free in conscience, but could not so suddenly change the outward old habit. Eousuetuão 68t altero, natura, much more where it grew out of God's law. Thus equity and reason teach that one should neither oppose nor hinder, but serve and promote, according to the commandment [Matth. 22,39.]: "Love your neighbor" 2c.

118) So the two articles, Peter and Jacob, are contrary to each other, and yet not contrary to each other; Peter's is of faith, Jacob's is of love. St. Peter's article suffers no laws, eats blood, suffocates, sacrifices to idols, and the devil in addition, and does not notice it, because he acts against God, and not against men, also does nothing, because believes only in the gracious God. But St. Jacob's article lives and eats with men, and directs everything so that they also come to St. Peter's article, and diligently prevents that no one be hindered. Now the work of love is so done on earth that that which it loves and promotes is changeable and transient, so that it is not eternal.

But passeth away, and after that cometh another, which must love them also unto the end of the world. When the Jews were destroyed or became stiff-necked, and the Gentiles no longer had to practice such love toward them, everything fell, not changed by the power of the church, as the papists lie, but because the cause no longer existed, the Christians freely ate the blood and the righteousness, which they refrained from for a time for the sake of the Jews, although they were not obligated to refrain from it before God according to faith. For where St. Jacob would have laid down such pieces as laws, he would also have had to lay down the whole law, as Gal. 5:3. St. Paul says, "He that keepeth one law must keep them all." This would be contrary to St. Peter's article, which St. James confirms.

(119) But that he should add fornication to it [Acts 15:20], which is forbidden in the ten commandments for ever. 15:20, which is forbidden in the ten commandments for ever, I consider it to be this cause. For fornication was not considered a sin among the Gentiles. As it was written in the pagan books, and as I have shown above, how twenty years ago the Curtisans and useless priests also began to speak and believe such things openly. Therefore it was as great a sin among the heathen to commit fornication, as to eat black pudding, rabbits in pepper, and idolatrous sacrifices. Read the histories of the Romans, how reluctantly they took wives, so that the emperor Augustus had to force them to marry. For they thought that fornication was right, and that it was violence and injustice to them to force them to marry. Therefore St. James wants to teach the Gentiles that they should, even without being forced by the authorities, gladly forsake fornication, and live conjugally, chastely, as the Jews did, who were highly offended by such freedom to fornicate, and could not believe that they should come to God's grace and become God's people, because of such inequality of food and behavior. 2c.

020 So the apostles did not lay down the law unto the Gentiles, but left it unto the Jews for a season, and preached grace freshly beside it. As we see in St. Paul, that he kept himself Jewish among the Jews, and Gentile among the Gentiles, that he might win them all, 1 Cor. 9:20. And circumcised his disciple.

Timothy, who was already a believer, Apost. 16, 3, not as if it had to be so, but as St. Lucas writes, for the sake of the Jews of the place, that he would not offend them. And afterwards Apost. 21, 26, he let himself be purified in the temple with the Jews, and sacrificed according to the law of Moses; which all he did, as St. Augustine writes the fine and now famous saying: Oportuit L'naZoZÄin eum stouoro sopoliro, that Moses, or his church and law, should be buried with honor.

121 But how such a council, and both the articles of St. Peter and St. James, were afterwards held, is abundantly found in St. Paul's epistles, wherein he complains everywhere of the false apostles, who, needing the law, and against grace, seduced whole houses and countries from Christ back to the law, yet under the name of Christ; even as after the Nicene council the matter became much worse. For when the rogue Arius thus humbled himself, and also accepted the Concilium with an oath before the emperor Constantine, wherefore the emperor allowed him to come in again, he first of all really stirred up the fire, and the bishops in his part, especially after Constantine's death through the son of the emperor Constantius (whom they had won in), played the game so horribly, that Constantius drove out all the true bishops in the whole world, except the two, Gregory and Basil. 1) For Eustathius also was cast out from Antioch, who had sat on high in the Concilio. And Osius of Corduba, the great bishop, as above told, became an Arian at last, and died shamefully within.

(122) Some say here that Constantine, the father, should also have become an Arian before his death, and should have ordered an Arian priest, faithfully besought by his sister Constantia at his deathbed, to the son Constantio in his will, through whom the Arians afterwards became so powerful. But this is not true. 2) Without such histories warning us to pray faithfully for the great lords, for the devil seeks them to the highest, as through them he can do the greatest harm. And that we also be careful ourselves,

And not easily believing the spirits of the wicked, when they humble themselves high and low, as this rogue Arius did; as Saul also did against David. But they keep behind the mountain until they get air and space, so they go along like Arius, and yet do what they had in mind before. That I am not much surprised why the fathers have imposed so severe and long repentance on the denied Christians; they will have experienced how false their humility is, and how difficult it is for them to humble themselves or repent with earnestness and from the bottom of their hearts, as Sirach also says [Cap. 12, 9.10.]: H) iuimieo rseoueiliato eto.

(123) Summa, whoever does not know what is meant by oseulum 3uäas, Judas' kiss, let him read with me the histories of Arii under Constantino, and he will have to say that Arius was far above Judas. For he entrusts the good emperor Constantinus with these beautiful words: We believe in One God Father Almighty, and in the Lord Jehovah Christ His Son, who was born of Him before all the world, One God, One Word, by Whom all things were made 2c. [John 1:3.] Dear, what Christian could consider such words heretical, or think that Arius herewith nevertheless considered Christ to be a creature? as it is clarified, since it comes to interrogation. Similarly, Auxentius, the bishop of Milan, who was next before St. Ambrose, teased the people with such beautiful words that at first I was almost angry at St. Hilarius when I read the title: Llaspsiomia Auxentii, anterior to the Confession of Auxentii. I would have risked my body and soul on Auxentii's word that he would have considered Christ to be a true God. I also hope that among such blind, weak words, many pious, simple-minded people nevertheless remained and are preserved in the former faith, as they could not have understood such words otherwise than as faith has been from the beginning. As no man can understand them otherwise, who knows nothing of the secret interpretation of the Arians.

014 And because such an example is necessary to know among Christians, and the common reader does not look at history so diligently, nor think how useful it is as a warning against all the other evil spirits, which the devil, her

God, makes it so slippery that it can neither be grasped nor grasped anywhere, I will briefly arrange this matter into several pieces.

Of the Arii's deceit and heresy. 1)

(125) First, Arius taught that Christ was not God, but a creature. Then the pious bishops forbade him, so that he had to confess that Christ was God. But this he did with such a false opinion, that Christ was God, like St. Peter and Paul, like the angels, who are called gods and children of God in the Scriptures. [1 Cor. 8:5, Jn. 10:34, Ps. 82:6, Job 38:7.]

(126) Secondly, when the fathers became aware of this, they continued to persecute him, so that he and his followers would admit that Christ was the true and right God, and they shied away from such words for the sake of the glare, because until then it had been taught in this way in all the churches. But among themselves they interpreted these words in this way, especially Eusevius, Bishop of Nicomedia, Arii's highest patron: Oinne kaetum Dsi est verum, what God creates or makes, that is true and right; for what is false, that God did not make. Therefore let us confess that Christ is a right, true God (but with us a made God, like Moses and all the saints) 2c. Here they added everything that is still sung in the church on Sundays, according to the Concilio Niceno: Oeum æe Deo, lumen æe lumine, Deum veruni æe Oso vsro.

(127) Thirdly, when such false deceit broke out, that they nevertheless called Christ a creature under such words, the disputation became more severe, that they had to confess that Christ had been before the whole world. Who could believe otherwise than that Arius and his bishops were true Christians, and unjustly condemned by the Nicene Council? For this they did soon after the Niceno Concilio (which had played with them for a short time, and set up the faith as it still existed), for they wished to destroy the Nicenum Concilium, and contested one thing after another.

128. fourthly, since such a blind grasp was also perceived, that Christ should nevertheless being and being called one creature, with such an interpretation, Christ would have been before all the world, that is, he would have been created and made before all the world, or any other creature [Col. 1:15], they were forced to confess that all the world, also 2) all things were made through him, as John 1:3 says; but among their people they interpreted it thus: Christ was made before, after that all things were made through him.

129. fifthly, they had now easily to confess Zenitum, of kaetum, born of GOD, not created [Joh. 1, 13.], born, as all Christians, born of GOD, are children of GOD, Joh. 1, 12. not created among other creatures, but before, before all creatures.

130) In the sixth place, when it came to the heart that Christ was one with the Father, that is, that Christ was one with the Father, and of the same Godhead, and of the same power, they could find no more deceit, hole, rank, or folly. Romousius means one and the same essence or nature, or one and the same, and not two and the same essence, as the Fathers had set forth in the Concilio, and as is sung in Latin: eonsudstantialis, some afterwards called eoexistentialis, eoessentialis. They had accepted this at Nicea in the Council, and they still accepted it when they had to speak before the emperor and the fathers. But with their own they contested it exceedingly severely; pretended that such a word was not in Scripture; held many concilia, even in Constantine's time, in order that they might weaken the concilium at Nicea; caused much misfortune, and afterwards made ours so anxious about it that even St. Jerome, upset by it, wrote a lamentable letter to the bishop of Rome, Damason, and began to request that such a word homousius should be scratched out. For I do not know what poison is in the letter, that the Arians make themselves so useless about it.

131 And there is still a dialogue in which Athanasius and Arius quarrelled before a magistrate Probus about this word homousius. And when Arius pressed hard that such a word was not in the Scriptures, Athanasius again with the same art caught Arium, and said, Neither are these words in the Scriptures, ivnasoibilis, inKenitus Dons, that is, God is innate, which the Arians had used to prove that Christ could not be God because He was born, but God was unborn 2c. And the magistrate Probus judged against Arium. For it is true that one should not teach anything in divine matters apart from the Scriptures, as St. Hilarius writes, 1. æ Irinit. This does not mean otherwise than that one should teach nothing else. But that one should not use more or other words than those found in Scripture cannot be kept, especially in disputes, and when the heretics want to make things wrong with blind grasps, and to pervert the words of Scripture: It was necessary that the opinion of the Scripture, which was set forth with many sayings, should be fasted into a short and summary word, and asked whether they held Christ homousion, as the opinion of the Scripture is in all the words, which they had perverted with false glosses among their own, but had freely confessed before Caesar and in the Concilio. As if the Pelagians would have driven us by this word, original sin, or Adam's pestilence, because such words are not found in Scripture, yet the Scripture teaches the same words opinion mightily, as that we are conceived in sins, Ps. 51:7, all by nature the children of wrath, Eph. 2:3, and all must be sinners for one sin's sake, Rom. 5:12.

132 Now tell me, if this very day Arius should come before thee, and confess unto thee the whole faith of Niceni Concilii, as we sing it this day in our churches, couldst thou think him heretical? I myself would say that he is right; and yet if he believed otherwise underneath, as a rogue, and understood and taught the words differently behind, would I not be well deceived? Therefore I do not believe that Constantine became an Arian, but remained with the Niceno Concilio. But this happened to him, that he was deceived, and believed Ario, as if he held the same with Niceno Concilio, whereupon (as said above) he took an oath from him, and so commanded that Arium should again be accepted at Alexandria. But since Athanasius would not do this, since he knew the false Arium better than Constantine, he had to be driven out. For it may well have occurred to "Constantine" as a man, as if he had Arium, such a pious part of Chris, is condemned to Nicea because of envy or suspicion; especially because the Arians, and especially Eusebius of Nicomedia, took care of the emperor, blued his ears full, and adorned Arium. For great kings and lords, even if they are pious, do not always have angels and St. John the Baptist around them at court [Marc. 6,18.], but often Satan [1 Kings 22, 24.], Judas [Luc. 22, 3.], and Doeg [1 Sam. 22,9.], as the kings' books well testify to us. And is this a gnt indication, that Constantinus before his end Athanasium anch was called to come in again, how hard also the Arians woe him, 3. Tripart. II. So that he testifies that he did not want to reject the Niceni Concilii and its doctrine, but would have liked to bring everything to unity.

(133) So now some of our false papist scribes also pretend to teach faith and good works, to adorn themselves with them, and to revile us, as if they had all taught thus, and we had unreasonably accused them of another, so that, if they had dressed themselves again in such sheep's clothing, as if they were quite like us, they might bring their wolf back into the sheepfold [Matt. 7:15]. For they are not in earnest to teach faith and good works, but because, like the Arians, they cannot maintain or restore their poison and wolfliness in any other way than by such sheep's clothing of faith and good works, they adorn and cover the bellows of the wolf until they come again into the sheepfold. But do unto them as they do unto ours, and call them to repudiate their abominations, and to prove them by putting away all the abuses which have reigned against faith and good works in their churches among their people, that they may be known by their fruits (Matt. 7:16). Otherwise one cannot believe the bad words and gestures, that is, the sheepskins. So Arius also should have recanted, confessed his error, and taught and lived contrary to himself, as St. Augustine did against his Manichaeism; as now many do against their popery and monasticism, among whom I can also count myself by the grace of God. But they do not want to have erred, and cannot give glory to God.

that they confessed it, just as the Arians also wanted to defend their lies and not to be banned by the Council.

(134) Such examples of these histories we ought to take note of, especially when we are to be preachers, and are commanded to feed the flock of Christ, that we may watch well, or be good bishops, as St. Peter says, 1 Pet. 5:2; for to be an episcopus, or bishop, is to watch well, to be valiant, to watch diligently, that we be not overawed of the devil. For here we see how he can so masterfully twist, disguise, disguise himself, that he becomes much more beautiful neither the angels of light [2 Cor. 11, 14.], and false bishops are holier neither the right bishops, and the wolf more pious neither a sheep. We have not now to do with the gross, black polter-pabst spirits apart from the Scriptures; they now find themselves into the Scriptures and our doctrine, desiring to be like us, and yet tearing us asunder. But the Holy Spirit alone must help here, and we must pray diligently, or we are far lost.

135 From all this it is evident why the Concilium was held, not for the sake of outward ceremonies, but for the sake of the high article of the divinity of Christ, as that was the cause of the quarrel, which was chiefly dealt with in the Concilium, and afterwards contested by the devil's unspeakable ravings, in which the other articles are not remembered. The lamentation has also lasted with the Christians until three hundred years, that St. Augustine holds that the torment of Arii in hell will increase daily as long as this error lasts, for Mahomet came from this sect. And as I have stated above, it is evident that this council has neither devised nor established anything new, but has condemned the new error of Arii against the old faith 1) by the holy Scriptures, so that from this the councils cannot be given the power (much less the pope at Rome) to change old articles, and 2) to devise or establish new articles of faith or of good works, as they falsely boast. Let this be said once enough of the first principal concilio at Nicea.

1) Placed by us to give meaning. All editions offer: "but has condemned the old faith against the new error Arii, by the holy Scriptures".

2) The words: "old articles to change, and" are missing from the first edition.

From the other main teoneilio Constantinopolitano. 3)

The other main council, assembled at Constantinople about fifty years after Niceno, under the emperors Gratiano and Theodosio, had these causes: Arius had denied the divinity of Christ, and 4) [not] of the Holy Spirit. Between them, a new mob, the Macedonians (as always one error brings another, one disaster another, without end and cessation), praised the Concilium Nicenum, that Christ was true God, and strongly condemned Arius with his heresy: But they taught that the Holy Spirit was not true God, but a creature of God, through whom God moved, enlightened, comforted, strengthened the hearts of men, and did all that the Scriptures say of the Holy Spirit. This mob also tore itself apart tremendously, among many great, learned, excellent bishops. Macedonius was bishop of Constantinople, the largest capital of the entire empire in the Orient, where the imperial court was located. The same bishop started this mob, which had a great reputation, that the most noble bishop, moreover in the emperor's residence at Constantinople, taught in this way. Almost everything that adhered to Constantinople in the countries around Constantinople fell to it, and Macedonius did not celebrate either; he pushed the matter hard and would have liked to draw all the world to himself (as the devil does in all groups).

137 Now here the pious bishops were much too weak to resist such a bishop's scandal, because before a bad priest at Alexandria, Arius, had made such a mess, but here not a priest, not a common bishop, but the bishop of the most noble city, the imperial palace at Constantinople, made such a mess. Here the bishops had to appeal to the emperor once again that a general council be assembled against such blasphemy. This the pious Emperor Theodosius did, and he placed it in the city of Constantinople, in the parish and church,

3) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

4) Here the Jena edition has the marginal note: "It seems as if there was a lack here, for as Nazianzenus and others more veterans testify, the time of the conflict was not yet aroused by the Holy Spirit."

since Macedonius had been bishop, just as Constantinus had previously laid the Concilium Nicenum in Nicea, since the bishop was Theogonius, who helped to raise Arium next to the bishop Eusebio in Nicomedia, and finally to bring him back.

(138) In the following year the bishop of Rome, Damasus, also held a concilium, and would have liked to have acted in Rome, so that the Roman see might have the authority to call concilia, and to judge all things, and should be called a universal concilium. For he summoned, as a supreme bishop in the world, the fathers who had held the Concilium at Constantinople the year before. But they did not want to come, but wrote him a very beautiful Christian letter about what they had done in the Concilium at Constantinople, showing him, among other things, how they had condemned Macedonian heresy. And further, how they had ordered other bishops at Constantinople, at Antioch, and at Jerusalem. Oh, they should not have done this without the knowledge and will of the bishop of Rome, who alone would have the right and power to appoint concilia (which he was not able to do), to judge all heresies (which he could not do), and to change bishops (which was not his due).

139) About this they give him a very good slap, telling how in the new church at Constantinople (for the city of Constantinople had recently been built) they had shredded Nectarium for bishop, and at Antioch Flavianum, and at Jerusalem Cyrillum. For these three pieces were almost irksome to the bishop at Rome, yea, unpleasant to hear and read. The first, that they call Constantinople the new church, and set a bishop there, when without the will and knowledge of the bishop of Rome neither a new church nor a bishop should be ordered. The other thing is still worse, that they call the church at Antioch the first and oldest church, in which (as they prove from St. Lucas, Acts 11:26) the faithful in Christ were called Christians for the first time, and St. Peter and Paul, together with many of the chief apostles, preached the gospel there for more than seven years. This would be said in my German: Hear ye it. He bishop of Rome, ye are not the first nor chief bishop, but where there should be a church, then the one at Antioch would be cheaper, which has for itself St. Lucas Scripture and the deed, but Rome has neither Scripture nor deed for itself.

(140) But there were fine and excellent men, who, according to Christian love and humility, wished to control the trustworthy spirit at Rome cleanly and gently, and, as Sirach teaches [Cap. 28:14], to spit into the sparks and to admonish that the bishop of Rome should consider, because the gospel did not come from Rome to Antioch, but from Antioch to Rome, that the oldest church at Antioch should take precedence over the younger church at Rome, where it should be applied. What ambition (as the word gives) has made such fine holy fathers ill-disposed towards the Roman bishop (how cheap). And if a Doctor Luther had been in the Concilio, such a mild letter would not have had to be written to the bishop of Rome, as much as he would have been able. In sum, there were people in this Council whom all the bishops of Rome who have ever been could not hold a candle to.

The third is the most serious, because they call the church at Jerusalem the mother of all churches, because Christ the Lord himself was bishop, and sacrificed himself on the cross as a sign for all the sin of the world [Heb. 7:27, 10:12]. There the Holy Spirit was given from heaven on the day of Pentecost, after which all the apostles (not only Peter, of whom the bishop of Rome boasts) governed the churches [Acts 2:4]. None of these things happened in Rome. With this they neatly admonish the bishop of Rome that he should consider that it is still far lacking that he is not bishop of Jerusalem in the mother church, but that his church at Rome is a daughter church, as it did not have Christ, nor did 1) the apostles or 1) Jerusalem bring to faith, but he was brought to faith with his church through them, as St. Paul also brought the Corinthians to faith. Paul also humiliated the Corinthians by saying that the gospel did not come from them, but came to them from others [2 Cor. 10:14].

142 But at last they do it too roughly beyond all measure, and set a patriarch in the new church at Constantinople, and do this without the knowledge and will of the bishop at Rome, as if nothing at all were attached to his knowledge of such matters. Here we see the eternal quarrel and strife (as the Pope's hypocrites themselves write) between the bishop of Rome and the bishop of Constantinople over the primacy or supreme authority. For since the bishop of Constantinople (though in a new city) was now placed on a par with the bishop of Rome as a patriarch, the bishop of Rome was concerned that the bishop of Constantinople would be subject to the primacy, as subsequently happened. For the bishops of Constantinople pretended that the emperor had his residence or court at Constantinople, and not at Rome, and that Constantinople was called the new Rome; therefore he should be the chief bishop, because he was bishop of the imperial city and court. Again, he who was at Rome pretended that Rome was the right Rome, and that the emperor was called the Roman emperor, and not the Constantinopolitan emperor, and that Rome had not been Constantinople before. Scratching themselves with such childish, effeminate, foolish jests, that [it] is sin and shame to hear and read.

1) In the first edition:

143 The quarrel lasted until Phocas became emperor, who had the pious emperor Mauritium (whom the histories call holy), his lord and ancestor (whose captain he had been), beheaded with his wife and children. This pious Cain confirmed to the bishop Bonifacio of Rome the supremacy over all bishops, and such supremacy should also be confirmed by no better man than by such a shameful emperor-murderer, so that Rome would have as good an arrival of the papacy as it had had before the arrival of the empire, since Romulus murdered his brother Remus, that he alone might reign and call the city Rome after his name. Nevertheless, the bishops at Constantinople did not teach themselves anything about it, and the quarrel remained for and for, although the Romans, on the emperor's confirmation, began to adorn themselves with fig leaves, and cried out loudly with a great roar, Revelation 12:3 ff. [13, 4. ff.], that the church at Rome was supreme, not from human order, but from Christ's own institution Matth. 16, 18.: Do it Peter. But they that were at Constantinople saw that they that were at Rome, being unlearned men, were leading the words of Christ falsely and inconsistently, and did not accept it.

(144) Thus the two churches, Rome and Constantinople, quarreled about the vain primacy, with vain, lame, futile jestings, until at last the devil devoured them both, that of Constantinople by the Turk and Mahomet, and that of Rome by the papacy and its blasphemous decrees. I am telling you all this so that you may see how such misery has arisen from this fine council at Constantinople, because the bishop there is a patriarch. Although it would not have remained without this if no patriarch had been appointed at Constantinople, for the ambitious devil's head at Rome had already begun to demand this of the bishops everywhere (as has been said above); and if the one at Constantinople had not happened to him, he would have rubbed up against those at Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch, and would not have wanted to suffer the decree of the Concilii at Nicea, in which he is placed on the same level as the bishop at Alexandria, and under the bishop at Jerusalem. For he will be without concilia and fathers, but divine, as set by Christ himself, as he roars, blasphemes, and denies in his decrees.

(145) Now we have this other principal council at Constantinople, which did three things. First, it confirmed that the Holy Spirit is the true God, and it condemned the Macedonian, who held and taught that the Holy Spirit was a creature. Secondly, he deposed the heretical bishops and appointed true bishops, especially in Antioch and Jerusalem. Thirdly, he made the bishop Nectarius of Constantinople a patriarch, so that the bishops of Rome became foolish, foolish, and foolish, even though the dear fathers had perhaps done so in good faith. The first part is the main part and the only reason why this Council was held, from which the Council's opinion can be understood, namely, that it should not do more, nor has it done more, than to receive the article of the divinity of the Holy Spirit, and with this the Council is finally directed, as for this reason it was called together. The other part, of the deposition of the bishops, is not an article of faith, but an outward, tangible work, which reason also ought and can do, that it is not necessary to have the Holy Spirit in a special way (as for the articles of faith), or to gather a council for this purpose. Therefore it will also be done another day after the conciliar day.

016 For they did not establish again the offices of the church or bishops at Antioch and Jerusalem, but left them as 1) they had found them from the beginning; only they put other persons in them, which was needful. For the offices must always have been in the church from the beginning, and must remain until the end. But other persons must always be placed in them, as Matthias after Judah [Acts 1:26], and living bishops after those who have died. This is not the business of the conciliar churches, but may, and indeed must, be done both before the conciliar churches, among the conciliar churches, and after the conciliar churches, according to the need of the churches. Concilium cannot be had daily, but persons must be had daily, who may be appointed to the offices of the churches as often as they become vacant.

147 The third part is a new one, that they make a patriarch out of human good opinion. But we have just told how this was done, and what shameful quarreling and bickering the two bishops caused over it, so that it is evident how the Holy Spirit did not order it. For it is not an article of faith, but an outward, tangible work of reason, or of flesh and blood. What doth the Holy Ghost inquire, which bishop goeth outwardly before or behind? He has other things to do, neither such worldly child's play. And we learn not only from this, that the Conciliar Churches have no power to establish new good works, much less new articles of faith; but we are also warned that the Conciliar Churches ought neither to establish nor to establish anything new, as they ought to know that they are not gathered together for this purpose, but are defending the old faith against the new teachers; without being able to establish new persons (who cannot be called articles of faith nor good works, for they are uncertain, mortal men) in the old, former offices. Which, except in the churches, must be done more and more every day.

1) Thus the Wittenberg and the Jena editions. Erlanger-. "where".

(148) The fathers of this Council themselves confess that they have not instituted anything new, when they write to the bishop of Rome, Damaso, (as I have said) what they have done in the Council, in other words, "We know that this is the old true faith, which is after baptism, and teaches us to believe in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. 2c. Yea, they are altogether silent of the third part, of the patriarch at Constantinople, perhaps that they thought it was not the part for which they came into the Concilium, and was no heresy, where a Christian would not, as an article of faith, hold the bishop to be a patriarch. Just as now many people are not heretics nor lost because they do not consider the pope to be the head of the churches, regardless of his concilia, decrees, bulls, and roars; or they did not do it all together, but the emperor Theodosius did it. For the other histories indicate that Theodosius instigated it and carried it out, who did not have the power to establish articles of faith.

(149) Since then they themselves say and confess that it is the old true faith, whereon we were baptized and taught before: what then shall we give the high power to the Conciliis, that they may establish new articles, and burn as heretics all those that believe not? This is not to say that the Concilium is rightly understood, and that they know nothing at all of what Concilium is, or what its office and doings are, but only to look at the letters, and to give it all power, even over God. Of this more hereafter. The other two main concilia are also to be considered fully and briefly.

Of the third principal concilio, at Epheso. 2)

150 The third main council was held under the emperor Theodosius the Younger, whose grandfather was Theodosius the First, of whom it is said above in the other council. The same emperor summoned 200 bishops to Ephesus. And even though the Latin scribes wanted to include the pope, the truth is that it is not the pope who is to be the first bishop of Ephesus.

2) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

It was not the pope, but the emperor who had to call this concilium together. For a patriarch of Constantinople was now equal to the bishop of Rome, so that the bishops towards the east now gave much less to the bishop of Rome than before. Therefore it was impossible for the bishop of Rome to call such a council, especially to Ephesus, far beyond the sea in Asia, otherwise he would have placed it, if he could, 1) nearer Rome. As Damasus did at the previous Concilium in Constantinople. But he is said to have had his message there. That would be fine, but they did not sit at the top.

151) And the cause of this council was, that the dear fathers and good bishops were gone, St. Ambrose, St. Martin, St. Jerome, St. Augustine (who died in the same year) St. Hilarius, St. Eusebius, and the like, and very unequal fathers arose in their place, so that even the emperor Theodosius no longer wished to have a bishop elected to Constantinople from among the priests or clergy in the city of Constantinople, for the reason that they were commonly proud, vainglorious, and carpish, who were wont to do vile mischief. For St. John Chrysostom was also such a head, as the Tripartite History reports. Therefore the emperor had an aevenain (so he is called) brought to Antioch, named Nestorius, who was of a strict, chaste life, well-mannered and eloquent, fierce to all heretics, and had to become "patriarch" and bishop of Constantinople. And in this the emperor ran wild, and found the right one; he wanted to escape the rain, and fell into the water.

152 He began to defend his priest Anastasius, who had preached that the holy Virgin Mary should not be called the mother of God, for because she was a man she could not give birth to God. This struck all Christians on the head, and they could not understand it otherwise than if he did not consider Christ, born of Mary, to be God, but to be a pure human being, as we all are; and out of this arose such a being and confusion, that the emperor had to assemble a concilium to investigate the matter.

1) Thus improved by Walch. In the other editions: "sonst hatte er's Wohl, wo er's vermocht hätte, würden" 2c. help. Then the high bishops (though slowly) came together to Ephesus, Nestorius with many others, Cyril of Alexandria, Juvenalis of Jerusalem. And when John of Antioch was about to depart, he went to Cyril, who was Nestorius, and Juvenalis, condemned Nestorius, and he them again with his own. And when John of Antioch was come, and found such a breach, he was wroth with Cyril, because he had hastened to condemn Nestorius with a hot brow: and the two of them came together over it, and condemned one another, and cast each other out of the episcopate.

153. When Nestorius saw that such a disgrace was exalted, he said, Oh, let us put away what makes such displeasure, and confess that Mary is called the Mother of God. But such recantation did not help him, and he had to remain condemned and expelled from the country. Although the two bishops, Antioch and Alexandria, condemned each other even after the Council, when they returned home, they were finally at peace again. It is nevertheless annoying, even miserable, to read that such high people acted so womanishly and childishly, [and] would have needed a Constantine who would also have thrown their letters of discord into the fire. But they were there who could do it.

154 If then Nestorius was in such error, that he held Christ not to be God, but to be a true man, he is justly condemned, as he that taught neither Arius nor Macedonius much worse. Now this is the third main council; it has done nothing more. And yet we see that it has not established a new article, but defends the old right faith against the new doctrine of Nestorius (if he taught otherwise), so that from this we cannot give the councils power to establish new articles. For the fact that Christ is the true God was previously asserted in the Concilio of Nicea and Constantinople as a true, old article, held from the beginning, and proven and convinced by the holy Scriptures against the new heresy of Arian. The "other" decrees, which are set forth there, concern bodily matters, and are not articles of faith; we leave them aside.

155 But in order that we may understand this Concilium thoroughly, let us go a little further into it.

to speak of. For I myself have not been able to understand what Nestorius' error was; I have always thought that Nestorius denied the deity of Christ, and held Christ to be nothing more than a mere man, as the papal decrees and all papal writers say; but from their own words, when I looked at them correctly, I had to think otherwise. For they blame him for making Christ into two persons, namely God and man. Some say, as if they could not understand it either, that he taught thus: Christ was first born of Mary a true man, and then lived so holy that the Godhead united itself with him, and thus became God. And their writing is so confused that I think that even today they themselves do not know what and why they have condemned Nestorium. Notice that they confess that Nestorius took Christ to be both God and man, without making two persons out of them. So it is certain from this that Nestorius did not hold Christ to be a true man, as we have all supposed, because he also holds him to be a god, according to their own words. And the only thing that remains is that he should have taken Christ, a right and true God and man, for a twofold person, as a divine and a human one. This is one.

156 Whosoever therefore shall divide Christ, and make two persons of him, maketh two Christs: one divine Christ, which is vain God, and not man; and one human Christ, which is vain man, and not God. Otherwise they could not be two persons. Now this is certain, that Nestorius believed not two Christs, but one Christ; as also their own words bring forth, that Nestorius took Christ, that is, the one, the same, the right, and no other Christ, to be two persons; so it must also be false and unjust, that Nestorius took Christ to be two persons. For it cannot stand together that Christ is two persons, and yet the same one Christ remains, but, as has been said, if there are two persons, then there are two Christs, and not one Christ. But Nestorius holds nothing more than One Christ. Therefore he could not consider Christ to be two persons.

Otherwise he would have to say yes and no to himself in the same article. Thus it is not written anywhere in the Histories that Nestorius considered Christ to be two persons, without the Popes and their Histories being so clever. Although they themselves confess that they write that Nestorius taught that Christ became God after the birth of Mary, or was united with God in One Person. This they were forced to do by their conscience, or by their erroneous reason, because they had to confess that Nestorius had no more than one Christ.

157 Now the question is, What then is condemned in Nestorius, and why is this third principal council held against him, if Nestorius teaches nothing else, but that Christ is truly God and man, and also one Christ, not two Christs, that is, one person in two natures, as we all believe, and all Christendom has believed from the beginning? For it is found that the pope, with his own, invented such words on Nestorium, that he took Christ to be one true man, and not also one God, and that he took Christ to be two persons, or two Christs. This is found not only in the Histories, but also in the words and writings of the popes and their writers. What then has Nestorius erred? that we may know the causes of this Concilii.

(158) Thou mayest read a leaf or two in the 12th book of Tripart. 4. read a leaf or two; you can do that in half a quarter of an hour; there you will find everything that can be thoroughly known about Nestorio and this Concilio; and see if I hit it. The defect is this: Nestorius was a proud, unlearned man, and since he became such a great bishop and patriarch, he thought that he must be the most learned man on earth, must not read any books of the forefathers or others, or learn to speak of things in their own way, but because he was eloquent and determined, he wanted to be a self-educated doctor or master, and as he said or pronounced it, it should be right. And he ran to this article with such pride that Mary is God's mother or God's child-bearer. Then again he also found proud bishops who did not like his pride, especially Cprillum of Alexandria. For

There was neither Augustine nor Ambrose present. Now Nestorius had learned in the church at Antioch that Christ was the true God, born of the Father in eternity, as the Concilium at Nicea had affirmed, and then born of the virgin Mary a true man. These two things were not in doubt with Nestorio, who had preached them himself for a long time; indeed, he persecuted the Arians, condemned in the Niceno Concilio, so fiercely that he also committed much murder and bloodshed over them. So firmly did he hold Christ to be a true God and man.

159. He also allowed that Christ, the Son of God, might be born of the virgin Mary according to humanity, not according to divinity, which we and all Christians also say. But he was not willing that Mary should be called the mother of God, because Christ was not born of her according to the Godhead; or, to put it plainly, that Christ did not have the Godhead from the mother, as mankind had from her. This is the war altogether, that GOD could not be born of a man, or have his divine nature, and a man could not give birth to GOD, or give to a GOD the divine nature. For the unlearned, coarse, proud man stood on this letter: GOTT born of Mary, and interpreted "Born" according to the Grammatica or Philosophia, as if it meant to have the nature of the Godhead from the Birth-giver, that also the Tripartite says: he held such words to be abominations, as we and all Christians (where they should have such understanding) also hold.

160 From this it is evident that Nestorius, being an ignorant and proud bishop, is in earnest about Christ; but according to his ignorance he knows not what and how he speaketh, as he hath no right knowledge of such things as these to speak of, and yet hath desired to be a master of them. For this we also know, that Christ did not receive his divinity from Mary. But that it should therefore be false that God was born of Mary, and that God is the Son of Mary, and that Mary is the Mother of God, does not follow from this. Of this I must set a gross example: When a woman bears a child, a lazy Nestorius (so Tripartite calls him) can thus be proud and unlearned and clever: This woman has given birth, but she is not the mother of this child; For the soul of the child is not of her nature or blood, but from somewhere else, as infused by God. So this child is born of a woman after her body, but because the soul is not of her body, it is not the mother of the child, because it is not the mother of the child's soul.

161 Such an idle sophist denieth not that the two natures, body and soul, are one person; neither saith he that there are two persons, or two children, but confesseth that the two natures, as body and soul, are one person, or one child; neither did the mother bear two children, but one child; but seeth not what he denieth, or saith. Nestorius also was such a man, who admits that Christ is God and man in One Person; but because the Godhead does not come from the Mother Mary, she is not to be called the Mother of God; this is justly condemned in the Concilio, and shall be condemned. And although Nestorius has a right opinion in one part of the main matter, that Christ is God and man, yet one should not suffer the other part, or such word and speech, that God is not born of Mary, and crucified by the Jews, just as one should not suffer the Sophist (who speaks quite rightly in the part that the mother cannot bear nor give birth to the soul of the child), since he says that the child is not the natural child of the mother, and the mother is not the natural mother of the child.

162. summa, the proud, unlearned bishop has made a Greek evil bite, as the Roman Cicero says of the Greeks: ckam äiu torgUst aontrovorsia verbi Dominos Zraseulos, eontsntionis eupiäioros, guain voritatis. For whosoever shall confess that a mother beareth a child that hath body and soul, let him say and hold that the mother beareth the whole child, and is the child's true mother, though she be not the mother of the soul; otherwise it would follow that no woman is the mother of any child, and the fourth commandment should be uttered, "Thou shalt honour thy father and mother." So also it must be said that Mary is the true natural mother of the child whose name is Jesus Christ, and she is the true mother of God, God's child-bearer.

more can be said of child mothers than suckling, washing, etching, watering, that Mary suckles GOD, weighs GOD, makes GOD porridge and soups 2c. For GOD and man is One Person, One Christ, One Son, One JESus, not two persons, not two Christs, not two sons, not two JESus. Just as your son is not two sons, two sons, two shoemakers, though he has two natures, body and soul, body from you, soul from God alone.

(163) Now Nestorii's error is not that he takes Christ for a pure man, nor makes two persons of him, but confesses two natures, God and man, in one person: but he will not admit communicationem idiomatum; that I cannot speak in German with one word. Idioms means what is attached to a nature or is its property, as dying, suffering, weeping, talking, laughing, eating, drinking, sleeping, mourning, rejoicing, being born. To have mutier, to suck breasts, to walk, to stand, to work, to sit, to lie down, and what is more, are called idiomsts nsturso lluwnsno, that is, qualities which are inherent in a man by nature, as which he may do or suffer, and indeed must. For idioms Greek, kroprium Istins, is A thing. Meanwhile, let us call it a quality. Again, idioms, voitstrn, divine nature property is that it is immortal, omnipotent, infinite, not born, not eats, drinks, sleeps, stands, walks, mourns, weeps. And what shall I say? It is an immeasurably different thing from God, neither is a man. Therefore the idiomsts of both natures cannot agree. This is the opinion of Nestorii.

164 If therefore I preach, Jesus, a carpenter of Nazareth (for so the Gospels call him: Aium ksdrri), walketh there in the street, and giveth his mother a pitcher of water, and a pennyworth of bread, that he may eat and drink with his mother; and this same Jesus, a carpenter [Matt. 13:55, Marc. 6:3], is the right true God in One Person; which Nestorius admits unto me, and saith it is right. But when I say, "God is walking in the street, giving water and bread, so that he may eat and drink with his mother; Nestorius does not admit this speech to me, but says: "To fetch water, to buy bread, to have a mother, to eat and drink with her, these are idiomata, attributes of a human and not of a divine nature. Thus, if I say, JESus Carpenter is crucified by the Jews, and the same JESus is the right GOOD; such Nestorius admits me to be right. But if I say, God is crucified of the Jews, he saith: No. For the cross, suffering, and death are not of divine, but of human nature idioms or attributes.

165 When therefore the common Christians hear these things, they cannot think otherwise than that he holdeth Christ to be a mere man, and separateth the person. Which he does not intend to do, unless the word is given as if he did it. From this it is evident that he was a very foolish saint and a man without understanding. For since he admits that God and man are united and blended in one person, he cannot in any way deny that the idioms of the natures should not also be united and blended. Otherwise, what would God and man be united in One Person? And his foolishness is precisely that which is taught against in the schools: Hui eoneodit sutoeodons bonso eonssHuontiso, non potsst noZsro 60N86HU6N8; in German we speak thus: If one is true, the other must also be true. If the 'other is not true, the first is not true either. He that admits that Greta is thy wife, cannot deny that her child (where she is pious) is thy child. When such things are taught in the school, no one thinks that such men can be rude; but ask the rulers and lawyers whether they have not often had such a part before them, who confess a thing, and yet will not admit what follows from it.

(166) But one might pretend that Nestorius had mischievously confessed that Christ was God and One Person. No, the proud man was not so clever, but meant it seriously. For in a sermon (says Tripartite) he cried out: No, dear Jew, you must not be proud, you could not crucify God. There he wants to say, Christ is God, but God is not crucified. And in the Concilio before Bishop Cyrillo he says: that many confess Christ as God, but the

I will never say that God is bitris or trinitris; that is to say, Jesus is God, as many of us confess; but that God should be born twice or thrice I will not teach; and this is in his mind (as Tripartite indicates), as God and death do not rhyme together. For it seems terrible to him to hear that God should die. And this was his opinion, that Christ was immortal according to the Godhead; but he had not so much sense that he could have spoken it thus. In addition, the other bishops were proud, not thinking how to heal the wounds, but how to make them worse.

(167) Now, although it must follow from Nestori's opinion, to speak thoroughly, that Christ was a pure man, and two persons, yet it was not his opinion. For the coarse, unlearned man did not see that he pretended impossible things, that at the same time he seriously held Christ to be God and man in one person, and yet would not admit the idiomata of the natures of the same person of Christ. The first he would hold to be true; but<sup>a</sup> that shall not be true, which yet follows from the first. So that he shows that he himself does not understand what he denies.

168 For we Christians must appropriate the idiomata of the two natures in Christ as equal and all in person, as: Christ is God and man in one person. Therefore, what is said of him as man must also be said of God, namely, Christ died, and Christ is God, therefore God died; not the separate God, but the united God with humanity. For of the separated GOtt both are false, namely, that Christ is GOtt and that GOtt died. Both are false. For there GOtt is not man. But if it seems strange to Nestorium that God should die, let him think that it is so strange that God should become man. For thus the immortal God becomes the one who must die, suffer, and have all human idiomata. Otherwise, what would the same man be with whom God personally unites if he were not to have proper human idiomata? It would have to be a ghost as the Manichaeans had taught before. Again, what is said of God must also be attributed to man. Namely, God created the world and is omnipotent; the man Christ is God, therefore the man Christ created the world and is omnipotent. Cause is, for there was One Person out of God and man, therefore the person of both natures leads idiomata.

(169) O Lord God, from such a blessed and comforting article one should always rejoice, sing, praise and thank God the Father for such unspeakable mercy, that He has allowed His dear Son to become like us, a man and a brother. Thus, the wicked Satan, through proud, ambitious, and desperate people, causes such unhappiness that our dear and blessed joy must be prevented and spoiled. Let this be lamented to God! For we Christians must know this: where God is not in the balance and gives the weight, we sink to the bottom with our bowl. This is what I mean: if it should not be said that God died for us, but only a human being, then we are lost; but if God's death and God's death lie in the bowl of the wagon, then it sinks, and we rise up as a light, empty bowl. But he may well go up again, or leap out of his bowl. But he could not sit in the bowl; he would have to become a man to us, so that it could be said: God died, God's torture, God's blood, God's death. For God in His nature cannot die; but now that God and man are united in One Person, it is rightly called God's death when the man dies who is One Thing or One Person with God.

This Concilium has also condemned the Nestorio far too little. For it deals only with the one idiom that God was born of Mary. Therefore, the Histories write that in this Council it was decided against the Nestorium, which is Mary,

They should not only decide that Mary was Hieotoeos, but also that Pila-celebrity was Hieotoeos, since Nestorius denied all idiomata of the human nature of God in Christ, such as dying, the cross, suffering, and everything that does not rhyme with the Godhead. Therefore they should not only decide that Mary was Hieotoeos, but also that Pilatus and the Jews were God's crucifiers and murderers, and the like. But that afterwards he was condemned by all idiomata with these words: Nestorius denies that Christ is God, and One Person, is well in sūeetu or ex oonseHuenti right, but spoken too harshly and too strangely, because Nestorius could not think from this otherwise than that violence and injustice had been done to him. For he never taught such words, but always said against them that Christ was the right true God, and not two persons, on which he harshly persecuted the Arians. For such coarse men cannot syllogize, or make oonseHuorltias, namely, that he should be called denying the substance or nature, who denies the iaiomata or attributes of nature; but so let the verdict be: Although Nestorius confesses that Christ, right God and man, is One Person, yet because he does not give the idiomata of human nature to the same divine Person of Christ, it is wrong, and as much as if he denied nature itself. And they should not alone have struck out the One idioma, of the Mother Mary. Thus the matter of this Concilii would have been the more clearly understood, which I respect that very few have hitherto understood. From Platina and his like more it is impossible to understand.

For I also have had before me Nestorianos, who very stiffly contended against me, that the Godhead of Christ could not suffer; and for a sign also Zwinglius wrote against me concerning this saying, Verbum oaro factum est [John 1:14], and badly would not that Verbum should be called factum, but would have it: Verbum e^ro luetu 68t, cause, God could become nothing. But at that time I myself did not know that such was Nestorii conceit, as I did not understand this Concilium either, but recognized such for error from the holy Scriptures, Augustino and Magistro Sententiarum. And who knows how many Nestoriani are still in the papacy, who nevertheless praise this Concilium highly, and do not know what they praise. For reason wants to be wise here, and does not want to suffer that God should die, or have a being in a human way, although it already believes by habit that Christ is God, as Nestorius does.

172] Neither did this Council establish anything new in the faith, as we have said above, but defended the old faith against the new conceit of Nestorius, so that no example can be taken from it, nor can the Council be given power to establish new or different articles of faith. For this article has been in the church from the beginning, and has not been made new by the Council, but has been preserved by the Gospel or holy Scripture. For it is written in St. Lucas, Cap. 1, 32, that the angel Gabriel announced to the virgin Mary that the Son of the Most High should be born of her. And St. Elisabeth [Luc. 1, 43.], "Whence cometh this to me, that the mother of the Lord is come unto me?" And the angels all at Christmas [Cap. 2:11], "Unto you is born this day a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Item St. Paul Gal. 4, 4. "God hath sent his Son, born of a woman." These sayings (I know for certain) hold firmly enough that Mary is God's mother. Thus says St. Paul, 1 Cor. 2, 8: "The princes of this world have crucified the Lord of Majesty"; Apost. 20, 28.: "GOD purchased the Church with His own blood," yet GOD has no blood to judge by reason. Phil. 2, 6. 7.: "Christ, being like unto GOD, was made a servant, and found in all men's ways." And the infant faith, Symbolum Apostolorum, says, I believe in JESUS CHRIST, his only Son, our Lord, who was conceived, born of Mary, suffered, was crucified, died, and was buried. 2c. There the idiomata of human nature are clear enough, and yet they are assigned to the only Son and Lord, in whom we believe as in the Father, and as in a true God. That is enough of this Concilio.

Of the fourth principal coneilio, at Chalcedon. 1)

173 The fourth main council is held at Chalcedon in Ponto or Asia (about two or three and twenty years after the third previous main council at Ephesus) by the

1) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

Emperor Martianus, who became emperor at Constantinople after the younger Theodosio. Anno 455. And so the four main concilia have been held for 130 years, since the one at Nicea was held in Anno 327. Before and after this, however, many other concilia were held, without the emperors, by the bishops themselves from time to time. But these four could not meet without the emperors, so frail were the holy fathers, since one would not easily give way to the other, as unfortunately the histories well testify, to give us special comfort that we should not despair, because the Holy Spirit was in some of these fathers, and they must be holy and be called, we will also be holy and become blessed.

174 But what the cause of this Concilii fei was, I myself would like to learn from another. For no credible historia reaches here. The Ecclesiastica ceased with the first Concilio Niceno, the Tripartite and Theodoretus with the third at Ephesus, and must now continue to believe almost the Pope and his Histories, which are very difficult to believe, for excellent, noticeable reasons: for they have therefore drawn everything to themselves, and have lied so shamefully about their majesty, and still continue to lie, that no one can build his conscience on it. Now, counselor, where will I be saved, who do not understand this council, nor know what it does? And where have they gone, the dear saints and Christians, who through so many hundred years have not known what this Council has established? For there must always be saints on earth, and when they die, other saints must live, from the beginning to the end of the world; otherwise the article would be false, "I believe a holy Christian church, congregation of saints," and Christ would have to lie, since he says [Matt. 28:20.], "I am with you unto the end of the world." Living saints (I say) must always be on earth, be where they can, otherwise Christ's kingdom would have an end, and there would be no one who prayed the Lord's Prayer, professed the faith, was baptized, went to the sacrament, was absolved 2c.

175 Well, Platina and others say that it is this cause: that at Constantinople an abbot, or, as they call it, Archimandrita, Eutyches, has against the Nestorium an And they have brought up other things, and taught that Christ is One Person alone in divine nature. But the Fathers in the Council decided that Christ was one person and two natures. This is now right and the Christian faith. But Pabst's Histories write that he taught that after the divinity had taken on humanity, and thus had become Christ in One Person, there remained no more than the divinity, and Christ alone was to be considered God and not man. If this is Eutyche's opinion, then he is almost a gross Nestorius, who is said to have taught two persons in Christ, and yet one person. So he must have taught two natures at the same time, and yet one nature in Christ. For thus 1) Pope Leo writes in a letter, that Eutyches and Nestorius teach abominable heresy. And it is true that he who teaches that Christ is two persons and yet one nature; and again, that in Christ there are two natures and yet one nature: these are of course contrary to one another, yea, each contrary to himself.

(176) But if the papists knew that this was not the opinion of Nestorius and Eutyche, they ought to refrain from such words, and to speak a little more clearly of the matter, and in terminis propriis, that is, to use their own words. Otherwise the heretics will think that they are being hurried by force and injustice by using false words, and that their words are being falsely interpreted, as I said above about Nestorio.

177 For that Eutyches holds not only one nature in Christ, the papists themselves give in their own words, when they say, Eutyches confessed that in Christ there are two natures, namely, that the Godhead took on humanity. He who confesses this says that Christ has more than one nature. But what Eutyches means by this, that afterwards in Christ alone the divine nature remained, without human nature, they do not indicate; they leave it thus hanging, as if Eutyches at the same time held that Christ had two natures, and yet not two, but one nature. So then also the histories become uncertain and obscure, so that no one can understand what Eutyches said.

1) In all editions except Walch: "schreiet".

or what the pope's histories mean; thus lose this concilium together with the reason why it is assembled. Yes, one can find it from the Conciliar Histories and from the Popes' letters [not] 1). But again, the pope's historians should not write so rough and unpolished, nor should they talk their own words to us, so that one can take from it that they have understood this Concilium almost as well as I have.

178 I will speak my thoughts. If I do, well; if not, hereby the Christian faith is not fallen. Eutyche's opinion is also (like Nestorii's) wrong about the Jdiomata; but in a different way. Nestorius does not want to give the idiomata of humanity to the Godhead in Christ, even though he is certain that Christ is God and man. Again, Eutyches will not give the idiomata of the Godhead to mankind, though he holds firmly that Christ is true God and man. As if I preached that the Verbum, the Son of God, Creator of heaven and earth, like the Father for ever and ever, Joh. 1, 13. 14. and the Verbum, the same Son of God, is truly man, Joh. 1, 3. Such things Eutyches allows me and does not doubt. But when I continue, and preach that the same man Christ is the creator of heaven and earth, then Eutyches is displeased, and is astonished at this word, A man maketh heaven and earth, and saith, No: for such a divine idiom (as to make heaven) is not for men. But think not that he hath before admitted Christ to be truly God and man in one person, and yet will not admit the consequence or poiwehueus douue eonssgueutiae.

For he who confesses that God and man are one person must, for the sake of this union of the two natures in one person, also badly admit that this man Christ, born of Mary, is the Creator of heaven and earth. For he has become that in One Person, namely God, who created heaven and earth. Eutyches does not understand such a consequence, and yet firmly says that Christ is God and man; see also

1) "not" is missing in the editions, but the Jenaer remarks: "Scheinet, als Mangel ein nicht".

Not that he must deny the human nature of Christ in Christ, where he rejects the divine idiomata of human nature. For thereby the person would be separated, and Christ would not remain a man. And this is what those want to indicate who write of Eutyche that he did not allow the human nature to remain in Christ, soieet in eovseguvvti, when he nevertheless confesses, seiliotzt in snteeoävntst, that the divine and human natures are One Christ, One Person, and two natures. Summa, as said above, he who confesses the two natures in Christ, God and man, must also admit both of their idiomata of the person. For God and man are nothing where they should not have their idioms. Therefore they both, Nestorius and Eutyches, with their error and understanding, are justly condemned.

180 Although it is true that Eutyches may have had more temptation than Nestorius. For the idiomata of human nature are much left behind him by Christ, as, eating, drinking, sleeping, mourning, suffering, dying, burying 2c. For he sitteth now at the right hand of God, eateth, drinketh, sleepeth, mourneth, suffereth, dieth nevermore for ever, as it shall also be unto us when we pass out of this life into that life, 1 Cor. 15:49,53. These are temporal and perishable idiomata; but the natural ones remain, as that he had body and soul, skin and hair, blood and flesh, marrow and bone, and all the members of human nature. Therefore it must be said: This man Christ, the flesh and blood of Mary, is the Creator of heaven and earth, has conquered death, destroyed sin, and broken hell, which are divine idioms, and yet are rightly and Christianly attributed to the person who is Mary's flesh and blood, because it is not two, but One Person.

181 As thy son Peter is called learned, so this idioma is of the soul only, and not of the body, and an Eutyches would alfenzen: No, Peter is not learned, but his soul. Again a Nestorius: No, I have not beheaded thy son, but his body. This is like making two persons out of Peter, or keeping only one nature, when it is not meant that way. This is foolishness and rudeness, and shows that they have been wicked vialooticü.

But such ignorance is not strange in the world, even in other things, where men often confess something, and yet deny that which must follow from it, as said, <sup>^ntvooävntv oouoosso</sup> utzZaro 60U86HU6U8. Now there are many great lords and learned men who freely and firmly confess that our doctrine of faith, which without merit makes just by pure grace, is right, but that for this reason monasticism and the worship of saints or the like should be left alone and despised, this strikes them upside the head, when it nevertheless enforces the consequence and consequence. For no one can be justified except by faith; from this it follows that one cannot be justified by monastic life. What is the use of it? What is the use?

182 And that I may also take myself by the nose, and not so ungratefully forget my foolishness: I taught twenty years ago that faith alone without works makes one righteous, as I still do. But if one had stood up then who taught that monasticism and nunnery should be called idolatry, and that the mass should be called the right abomination, I would not have helped to burn such a heretic, but I would have kept it, and it would have served him right. And I, an inconsiderate fool, could not see the consequence that I should have yielded, that where faith alone did it, monasticism and the mass could not do it. And what was even more subtle, I knew that it was all human doctrine and work, and yet I did not ascribe such to the good works commanded by God and done in faith. I have indeed proved my Nestorium and Eutychen (but in other matters), since I admitted one thing, and did not admit the other, which follows from it, just as Nestorius admits that Christ is God and man, and will not admit here also that the same God was born and died, which follows from it.

(183) Luther further reproaches the papists, saying that they do not teach the Christian faith, neither do they teach good works, neither do they celebrate; but he again reproaches Luther much more vehemently, saying that he does not teach the Christian faith aright, and that he forbids good works. What then offends them, that they are not one, if they profess the same thing? This I will tell thee: There is a Nestorius here who is mistaken about the Jdiomates. Luther wants to have good works, but they are not to be the same.

The Lord's glorious divine idiomata, that they may be sufficient for sin, propitiate the wrath of God, and make sinners righteous. For such idiomata belong to another, who is called "the Lamb of God, which bareth the sin of the world" [John 1:29]. Yes, indeed, the blood and death of Christ are to be left such idiomata; good works are to have other idiomata, other merit and reward. The papists do not want such things, but give good works to be sufficient for sin, and to make men devout. Therefore they cry out that Luther does not teach good works, but forbids them. But they do not see this consequence or consequence, that where one teaches such good works as are sufficient for sin, that [it is] just as much as teaching no good works. For such good works are nillil in rsrnw natura, nothing and nowhere, neither can they be. Therefore, even in that they teach and profess good works firmly and almost, they teach no good works at all.

(184) Here thou seest what the Nestorii vialootioa is, who giveth an ant666Ü6N8, and denieth the 6ON86HN6N8, and so maketh the ant66tz^6N8 also false. For if one is true, the other must also be true in a right consequence or consequent. Again, if the last is false, the first must also be false. Good works do enough for sin, which they not only admit, but also do severely; but the other thing, which follows from this, that such works are not good, and are nothing and no works at all, this they condemn. Now this follows very clearly from the foregoing. For good works sufficient for sin are as much as no good works. Just as this consequence is mighty, Hni äoost iä, Hnoä von 68t, äooot nillil, whoever teaches that which is nothing, teaches just as much as nothing. So also may faith be spoken of: he that teacheth such faith as justifieth not by itself, and without works, teacheth as much as no faith. For such faith as justifies with or by works is nothing and nowhere.

(185) I will set a greater thing. Some lawyers admit that the marriage of priests is right, but they do not say that the children should be heirs. This is just as much as to say that the marriage of priests must be fornication. For if there be marriage, the child also must be heir.

be, if it be not heir, there is no marriage (cactsr̄is paribū8); 1) such is called in the schools: N6AE CON86C(U6N8 antoesänt^ 6OU6688I in bona C0U86CsU6ntia; and: ck68tructo 60N86Cfusntc, rstincrc ant6ccck6N8, which is impossible, and are called coarse, unintelligent people. But both Nestorius and Eutyches lacked this, as happens to many in other matters. For it was certainly their earnestness that they both held Christ to be God and man in one person, as the Histories and also the Acta Ooncilioniw indicate, and yet they could not have judged themselves in the consequence or consequence that the person who is God and man was indeed crucified and created heaven, but God may not be crucified, nor man create heaven.

186. And what shall we say of ourselves? The apostles at Jerusalem [Apost. 15:11], together with many thousands of Jews, were justified by faith alone, that is, by the grace of Christ; yet they also had their Nestorios and Eutyches in their skin, and did not see this consequence, that the law of Moses did nothing to it, nor could it do anything, but also wanted to give it the idiomata, which belong to the Lamb of God alone, and said (as said above): the Gentiles could not be saved, if they did not circumcise themselves and keep the law of Moses. This was as much as to deny Christ with his grace, as St. Paul saith Gal. 2:21, "If of the law is righteousness, Christ died in vain," and Rom. 11:6, "If it be grace, it is not works." But those at Jerusalem say thus: It is grace alone, but it must nevertheless also be 2) the work; 3) for since grace has not yet done this, the law must do it, as it follows. That is, in German, to hit oneself in the cheek, and not to understand what one is saying. The schools call it (as I have said) ^nt666ck6N8 conccckrc, and CON86C(U6N8 QCAars; or 6OU8S^U6N8 ä68tru6r6 and antcccäcnZ atLrinarc; at the same time saying yes and no in one and the same thing.

1) The words: (cctcr̄is paridus) are missing in the first edition.

2) So the Jenaer. In the other editions: "alone" instead of: also.

3) In the very first printing it was thus written: "For without law one cannot be saved, although one must be saved by grace alone without works, but later, as it is written here, corrected" (Walch).

Things. No one has to do this, except a man who does not understand or a desperate scoffer.

(187) So do my antinomians also, (4) who preach very finely, and (as I cannot think otherwise) with real earnestness, of the grace of Christ, of the forgiveness of sins, and what more is to be said of the article of salvation. But this consequence they flee, as the devil would, that they should tell men of the third article, sanctification, that is, of new life in Christ. For they think that men ought not to be alarmed nor grieved, but always to preach comfortingly of the grace and forgiveness of sins in Christ, and by all means to avoid these or such words: Hear thou it, thou wilt be a Christian, and yet remain an adulterer, a whoremonger, a full sow, a hopeful, a miser, a usurer, an envious, a revengeful, a wicked man 2c. but so say they: If thou hearest, thou art an adulterer, a fornicator, a covetous man, or any other sinner; but if thou believest, thou art blessed; thou shalt not be afraid of the law; Christ hath fulfilled it all.

188 Dear, tell me, is not this called ^nto66äs̄n8 conceded, and 6on86Hucn8 negated? Yea, it is in the same thing to take away and make void Christ, when he is most highly preached. And it is all yes and no, in the same thing. For such a Christ is nothing and nowhere, who died for such sinners, who after the forgiveness of sins do not leave their sins and lead a new life. So they preach Christ in Nestorian and Eutychian dialectics, that Christ is, and yet is not; and are fine preachers of Easter, but shameful preachers of Pentecost. For they preach nothing of the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, but only of the redemption of Christ, when Christ (whom they preach highly, how justly) therefore is Christ, or has purchased redemption from sins and death, that the Holy Spirit should make us new men out of the old Adam, that we should die to sin, and live to righteousness, as St. Paul teaches [Romans 1:9]. Paul teaches [Rom. 6, 2. ff.], to begin and increase here on earth, and to accomplish there.

gratiaw, grace, but also ðouum, the gift of the Holy Spirit, that we might have not only forgiveness of sins, but also cessation of sins. He therefore that ceaseth not from sins, but abideth in the former wickedness, must have another Christ from the antinomians. The true Christ is not there, and when all the angels cry out, "Christ, Christ," he must be condemned with his new Christ.

190 Now behold how wicked vialeetioi we are in high things, so above us or unpracticed that we hold and do not hold a thing at the same time. But in low things, there we are exceedingly sharp vialeotiei. For a peasant, how coarse he is, he hath soon understood and reckoned this: he that giveth me a penny giveth me not a florin; for it followeth of himself, and he seeth the consequence fine. But our antinomians do not see that they preach Christ without and against the Holy Spirit, because they want to burden people to remain in their old nature, and nevertheless pronounce them blessed, when the consequence is that a Christian should have the Holy Spirit, and lead a new life, or know that he has no Christ. Nor do the asses want to be better vialeotiei than N. Philip and Aristotle; of Luther I must be silent, because the pope felt the same 1) alone; they flew far too high for me. Well, Nestorii and Eutyches viateetia is a common plague, especially in the Holy Scriptures; but in other matters it knows how to hold its own. Although in subtle matters it gives lawyers and rulers enough trouble, since they must sometimes hear yes and no at the same time, and have trouble separating them.

(191) Now if Eutyches or Nestorius have remained stiff and proud of their fine sense (as I cannot judge, nor should I, so far as I have read the Histories) according to the bishops' instruction, they are not only condemned as heretics, but also as gross fools. If, however, they did not stand firm on their sense, as reported especially by Eutyches of the Conciliar Acts themselves.

1) It might want to read "derselbigen" (Luthern). The reading: "the same ones" (the antinomians, the bad dialecticians) does not seem to us to give a suitable sense. To refer this word "the same" to "Philip and Aristotle" seems to us impossible.

and they have not, according to St. Paul's teaching [Gal. 6:1], kindly instructed the erring person, they have nevertheless judged the matter rightly in themselves, but with their pride and weak nobility (because now the Concilii has attained great prestige, and here there have been six hundred and thirty bishops) they must answer to the right judge.

192 I remember how M. Johannes Wesalia (who was a preacher in Mainz, and before that governed the high school in Erfurt with his books, from which I also became a master there) had to be condemned by the desperate, hopeful murderers, called baeretieae pravitatis iu'uisitores (I should say: iuventores), preacher monks, only because he did not want to say: Oeão Oeum esse, but said: 8eio lleum esse. Dem: all schools held that Deum esse, per se uotum sit, as St. Paul Rom. 1, 19. also saith. How also the barefoot murderers at Eisenach dealt with Johann Ilten 2) is written in the Apologia.

193 I suppose that an honest man would come to you and to me without warning, who could make things strange with rough words, and say, Shall I not tell you that a new prophet has arisen who teaches that where a man becomes fully holy he can not only do miracles, but also create heaven and earth, angels, and all that is in them, out of nothing, as some scholastics have also argued? 4. and that is still worse, he says that the old right God has died 2c. Here you and I would say, that must be the devil and his mother. Scripture says (Mal. 3, 6.), "I am GOtt, and am not changed." And St. Paul [1 Tim. 6:16.], Hui solus trabet iuwortalitatem. What may it be much word? GOD liveth alone, and is life itself. Then he began: Teach ye yourselves thus, and say that Christ is a man, perfectly holy, who created heaven and earth, and also true God, who died for you on the cross. Behold, how suddenly we have become blasphemous Nestorius and Eutyches, who at the same time confess that Christ is God and man, One Person, who died for us, creating heaven and earth.

2) In the Apology in this volume Col. 1326 he is called "Johannes Hilten".

and yet said above that it must be the devil and his mother, whoever says that a man created heaven and earth, and that God died, when it is the consequence or consequence that we must believe that Christ is God and man in one person. There you stand, as the idiomata unawares thrust unthinking people before the head and make them astray. Here one should approach, teach with gentleness, and not condemn the erring with pride. God grant that I lie. I see to it that some heretics will be judges on the last day, and the judge-bishops will be damned. God is strange and incomprehensible in his judgments (Rom. 11, 33), so that one does not know that he is merciful to the humble and that he is worthy of hope (1 Pet. 5:5): And especially in the churches and church ranks, one should not do anything out of envy, jealousy, or pride, for God does not like it.

I have such thoughts from the Eutyche. If I have not got it right, then I have failed, and it is their fault. Why have they not done it more properly, and described it more diligently, that it might be more clearly understood? And what should be done, if this council were lost? The Christian faith would not have to sink for that. Surely more and more useful things are lost than this Council. St. Augustine himself complains that he finds almost nothing among his ancestors that helps him against the Pelagium, and yet much must have been done about this main matter. But I have held to these thoughts according to the words of the Roman bishop Leonis, who writes that Eutyches and Nestorii are heresies against each other or contrary and reversed. Now it is certain from the Tripartite that Nestorius confessed Christ to be true God and man, even quite vehemently, and was not an Arian who badly did not hold Christ to be God; but he drove them out and persecuted them, even by murder and slaughter. But this is his heresy, that the idiomata have disturbed and misled him, that God should be born of the image of a woman, and be crucified. Therefore Eutyche's heresy must have been contrary to reason, in that he holds Christ to be both God and man, but will not give the idiomata of divine nature to the Humans. As Nestor, again, does not want to attribute the idiomata of human nature to God in Christ's unique person; that is, against each other or reversed.

195. But if his opinion be that he badly denies the human nature in Christ, his heresy is not contrary to the heresy of Nestorii, but he must have been senseless and furious, who at the same time should hold that in Christ the Godhead is united with mankind, and yet one nature alone, namely, the Godhead remains or becomes. This would not only be against Nestorium, but against all believers and unbelievers, against all heretics and true Christians, against all heathens and men. For thus no man ever taught. But because they have described this thing in such a way that they themselves testify that Eutyches confessed Christ, uniting deity and humanity in one person, and write the other in such a way as if they did not want it to be understood, we do not want to understand it either. What do we care, if we have it much better otherwise! Eutyches says in the Concilio that he did not speak it in such words as they blamed him, namely, that he should deny the human nature in Christ. From this it may be seen that he erred, and did not mean to deny Christ's humanity. But if I were Doctor Luther, I would gladly hear from the Papist writers how they could believe even their own words, since they may say this: Nestorius held at the same time two Persons, and yet only One Person in Christ; Eutyches held at the same time two natures, and yet only One in Christ. I truly think they are also Nestorian and Eutychian dialectici; of theology I speak nothing; perhaps they must be antilogists.

196 And that we come again to the Concilio, it is also found here that this Concilium has not established a new article of faith. But this is not an example to give power to the Conciliis, that they should charge Christianity with new articles. For such an article is much more abundantly and powerfully founded in Scripture, John 5:27: "The Father hath given the Son power to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man." Here would have Christ, in Eutyche's opinion, must say, because he is the Son of God. For judgment is an idiom of divine nature, and not of human nature; but Christ gives it to his human nature, which is the Son of man, that is, the Son of Mary the virgin. And Matth. 22, 43. Christ asks the Pharisees: how is it rhymed that David called Christ, who ought to be his son and seed, his Lord? If he is David's son or seed, how is he seated at the right hand of God? Here Eutyches should have said: David's seed cannot sit at the right hand of God. God's right hand, but only God's Son; and yet confess that God's Son and David's Son are One Person. But where the Person sitteth, there sitteth the Son of God and the Son of David. Eutyches does not see this consequence, and therefore it must have been thought that he regarded Christ as not a man, but only as a divine person and nature; which, however, is not his opinion.

197 And in sum, all the prophets, all the scriptures, which give Christ or Messiah an everlasting kingdom, redemption from sins, death, hell, are all against Eutychen. For they all say that the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head, Genesis 3:15, that is, overcome sin, death, the devil, hell, which are divine idiomata, and not of the seed of the woman. And all the world should be blessed by the seed of Abrahā, Gen. 22:18. that is, also to take away sin, death, hell, the curse of God; which are also idiomata, not of Abraham's seed, but of divine nature. And after this the glorious, mighty prophecies of David, Esaiā, Jeremiā [Cap. 23,5.] and all the prophets, who say of David's seed that it shall establish eternal righteousness, that is, put away death, sin, hell. Which are vain idiomata of divine majesty and nature, yet are appropriated to the Son of David, Christ, the Son of the virgins of Mary, in all Scripture. If therefore I have not this Concilium, or understand it not aright, yet have I this Scripture, and understand it aright, according to which also the Concilium is bound to keep itself, and is more certain to me than all Concilia.

198 Whoever wants to, may continue to read the Concilii stories themselves; I have read myself unamused by them. Such a biting, biting turmoil and disorder is kept inside, that I almost have to believe the Gregorio Nazianzeno. St. Hieronymi Preceptor, who yet lived before this time, and saw better Concilia or Fathers, yet writes thus: If truth be told, I hold that all bishops' Concilia should be fled. For I have seen no good end of conciliarities, nor of the abolition of evil, but of ambition, strife for action, 2c., that I wonder how it happens that for the sake of such words they have not long since made of him the worst of heretics. But it is true that he says how the bishops are ambitious, proud, quarrelsome, and vehement in the Concilia; you will find that in this Concilio. Neither must they of necessity all be holy, who teach rightly, or receive right doctrine. For Balaam also prophesieth rightly, [Num. 24:17.] and Judas also is a right apostle, [Matt. 10:4.] and the Pharisees sit on the throne of Moses, and teach rightly, Matt. 23:2; so also we must have something more 1) and more certain for our faith, neither are the Concilia. That same more and certain thing is the holy scriptures.

199 But that it is true, when he says that he has seen no good end of the Conciliar, the histories teach us well. For Arii's heresy was a joke before the Niceno Concilio, compared to the misery they caused after the Concilio, as was said above. The same happened to the other Conciliis, as with Macedonio and Nestorio. For the part that was condemned held together all the more tightly, wanted to adorn themselves and be uncondemned, and always stirred up the fire more fiercely than before, against the Concilia, which they did not quite understand. Just as it happened to us Germans with the Costenzer Concilio, since the pope was subjected to the Concilio and deposed, and his tyranny and Simonei were harshly condemned, the pope is now possessed with seven evil devils, and has caused his tyranny and Simonei at first; eats, robs, steals all monasteries, convents and churches, sells indulgences, grace, law, God, Christ, the Holy Spirit; betrays, corrupts, confuses emperors and kings; gets, wastes blood, beats to death.

1)	This	"more"	stands	for:	More.

Body and soul, that one must grasp who is the God of Rome's household. There we Germans have our reward for having deposed and reformed the popes in the Costenzer Concilio. I think the end of this Concilii is well advised. Another time, depose more popes and reform them, if they do not have enough seven devils, so that they get seven and seventy legions of them against you, if there is still room for more devils to enter them, and if they are not already full of devils. This is the reformation of the Costenzer Concilii.

200 Thus we have the four principal concilia, and the causes why they are held. The first, at Nicea, defended the deity of Christ against Arium. The other, at Constantinople, defended the Deity of the Holy Ghost against Macedonium. The third, at Ephesus, defended One Person in Christ against Nestorium. The fourth, at Chalcedon, defended two natures in Christ against Eutychia, but did not establish a new article of faith. For these four articles are much more abundant and powerful in St. John's Gospel alone, even if the other evangelists and St. Paul and St. Peter had not written anything about them, who nevertheless also teach and testify to all these things powerfully, along with all the prophets. Now if these four principal Concilia (which the bishops of Rome, according to their decree, 1) hold equal to the four Gospels, just as if such pieces did not stand much more abundantly beside all the articles in the Gospels, or if the Concilia did not have it from the Gospels; so finely do the ass-bishops understand what Evangelia or Concilia are!) neither want to nor can they make or set anything new in articles of faith, as they themselves confess: how much less can such power be given to the other concilia, which must be held inferior, where these four are to be and to be called the principal concilia.

201 Now in this manner must all other concilia be understood, whether they be great or small; and if there were many thousands of them, that they were nothing new, either in faith or

1) The sense of this passage is: which, as the bishops of Rome say in their decree, are to be held equal to the gospels. But as the highest judge and the greatest bishop under Christ, they defend the old faith and the old good works according to the holy Scriptures, without also dealing with temporal, perishable, changeable things in their time of need, which must also be done apart from the churches in all parishes and schools. But if they do anything new in faith or good works, let it be certain that the Holy Spirit is not there, but the unholy spirit with his angels. For this they must do without and apart from the holy Scriptures, yea, contrary to the holy Scriptures, as Christ saith [Matt. 12:30.], "He that is not with me is against me." The Holy Ghost knoweth and can do no more than St. Paul, when he saith 1 Cor. 2:2, "I know nothing but JEsu Christ crucified." And is not the Holy Ghost given to instill or teach us any thing apart from Christ, but to teach and remind us of all things in Christ, [Joh. 14, 26.] "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and understanding," [Col. 2, 3.] the same he is to transfigure us, as Christ saith, [Joh. 16, 19.] and not to magnify or make an idol of our reason and conceits.

(202) Therefore such concilia, besides the Scriptures, are Caiphas', Pilate's, and Herod's concilia, as the apostles say, Acts 4:27: Oonvenunt in unum ackversns Dorninurn, they counsel or hold concilia against God and his Christ. 4, 27.: Oonvenerunt in unum ackversns Dorninurn, they rathschlagen oder halten Concilia gegen GOTT und sein Christum [Ps. 2, 2.]. And the evangelists all write that the chief priests and Pharisees held counsel or gathered concilia, how they might kill Christ [Matth. 26, 4. Marc. 14, 1. Luc. 22, 2.], as David had declared before, Ps. 2, 2. that they would counsel against God and his anointed, and call Christ's preaching vain bands and cords, and would break them and cast them from them. Such have been the more parts of the pope's concilia, wherein he sets himself up as the head of the churches in Christ's stead, throws the holy scriptures under himself, and tears them asunder, as his decrees point out, as he has condemned both forms of the sacrament at Costence, has torn up marriage before, forbidden it, condemned it, and crucified and buried Christ in a bad way.

Now here will be the main question for which I am writing this booklet: What then is a Concilium, or what is its work? For if it should not establish new articles of faith, then all the world would be miserably deceived, which neither knows nor holds otherwise, than: what a Concilium conspires, that is an article of faith, or at least to be considered a necessary work for salvation, so that whoever does not keep the Concilii decree, can never be saved, as he who is disobedient to the Holy Spirit, the Concilii Master. Well then, I consider my conscience free, that no concilium (as said above) has power to establish new articles of faith, because the four principal concilia have not done so. Therefore I will state my opinion here, and answer the principal question thus: that a council has

(204) First of all, no power to establish new articles of faith, notwithstanding that the Holy Ghost is in them. For even the Apostle Conciliar at Jerusalem, Apost. 15:11, does not establish anything new in the faith, but, like St. Peter, admits that all their forefathers also believed this article, that one must be saved without law, by the grace of Christ alone.

205 Secondly, a council has the power, and is also obliged, to restrain and condemn new articles of faith, according to holy scripture and ancient faith, as the council at Nicea condemned the new article Arii, that at Constantinople the new article Macedonii, that at Ephesus the new article Nestorii, that at Chalcedon the new article Eutyches.

0206 Thirdly, a council hath no power to command new good works, neither can it do so. For all the good works commanded in the holy scriptures are superfluous. What more good works can be devised than those which the Holy Ghost hath taught in the Scriptures? than humility, patience, meekness, mercy, faithfulness, charity, peace, obedience, discipline, chastity, giving, serving 2c. [Gal. 5:22.], and summa, love.

1) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

What good work can be devised that is not commanded in love? [But if it be apart from love, what good work is it?] For love, according to the doctrine of St. Paul, is the fulfillment of all commandments, as Christ himself says, Matt. 5:44.

(207) Fourthly, a council hath power, and is also bound to do, to condemn evil works contrary to charity, according to the holy scriptures, and the ancient manner of the churches, and to punish persons, as the decree of the Nicene council condemns the bishops' and deacons' honour and other vices. Here, however, we should speak of two kinds of evil works: some that are manifestly called and are evil, such as avarice, murder, adultery, greed, and the like. These we find condemned by the Conciliis, as they are also condemned in Scripture without the Concilia, and are also punished in secular law. But besides these are other new good works, which are not called evil, but are beautifully evil, 2) fine vices, holy idolatry, devised by the special saints or also mad saints; and summa, the white devil and light Satan. Such evil (I should say) new good works ought to condemn the Concilia most highly and severely, for they are dangerous to the Christian faith and annoying to the Christian life, and make both of them an unspeakable or contemptible thing.

208. as when a weak Christian hears or sees a holy hermit or monk leading a special, strict way, above the old common Christian state or being, he is offended by it, and thinks that against this new saint of all old Christians life is nothing, or even worldly and dangerous. Therefore it is an abomination in all the world that a Christian citizen or peasant who has a right, pure faith in Christ, and practices the right old good works commanded by God in Scripture, such as humility, patience, gentleness, chastity, love and faithfulness toward his neighbor, diligence and care in his service, office, profession, and station: this one is a right old saint and Christian; but he must stink and be nothing compared to the new saint, who under a but garment, food,

2) That is, they are evil with a beautiful appearance.

The saint is a haughty, ambitious, angry, impatient, ugly, carnal, presumptuous, false Christian. St. Paul himself [2 Tim. 3, 2. ff.] calls such hopeful and self-willed saints, who choose for themselves a new nature and worship of their own (not commanded by God) over the old, right common nature and worship of the Christian Church, established and commanded by God.

209. The elect may be preserved fine in such new evil works, but they have to take off this new skin again, and be saved in the old Christian skin. As happened to St. Anthony, when he had to learn that a cobbler or a tanner at Alexandria would be a better Christian than he with his monasticism. As he also confessed, he would not have come so far as the same cobbler. So also the great Saint John, primus Lremita, who was also a prophet to the emperor Theodosio, highly praised by Saint Augustine: when the people wondered at his scatterings, among whom Saint Jerome was one, he gave this answer: "What special thing do you seek among us? You have it better in your parishes, where the Scriptures and examples of the apostles and prophets are preached to you! That is to say, to take off your caps, and to throw yourselves under the holy Scriptures, to praise the common Christian state alone. Paphnutius had to learn that he was like a fiddler who had been a murderer, like two wives who had lain with their husbands the same night, and had to say, "One should not despise any class. This is what happened to St. Bernard, St. Bonaventure, and no doubt many more devout men; when they finally felt that their new holiness and monasticism could not hold the sting against sin and death, they crawled to the cross, and without such new holiness became blessed in the old Christian faith, as St. Bernard's words testify in many places.

210 Such new good works are not found condemned in any conciliar, especially in the four main conciliar, without one or two small concilios, as that of Gangra of 20 bishops (so recently*) is in print.

j) In 1537. see Document No. 1242 in this volume.

(The Holy Spirit) has done something in this, but rather they have let such new holiness take over, until the Christian church is almost no longer recognizable, and like the industrious gardeners let the water sprouts take over, so that the old right tree must suffer damage, or perish. At that time, already from St. Anthony on, monasticism was so rampant that in this fourth Concilio, also near Constantinople, there was an abbey in which the above-mentioned Eutyches was abbot. Although they were not such stone imperial castles as the monasteries became afterwards, for they call him ärita. Uanārao is said to mean a bad fence or enclosure, such as is made of bushes, shrubs, and brushwood for the cattle, or hurdles for the sheep, and Eutyches, as the chief, fed in such an enclosure with his own, and led a separate life. From this it can be understood what a monastery was at that time, since there was no monastery yet that had a closed or walled hut.

021 But as it is in the garden, where the water-branches, or shoots, grow much higher, neither the right fruitful branches; so it is also in the garden of the church, that such new saints as grow by themselves, and yet desire to be Christians, and feed on the sap of the tree, increase much more abundantly, neither the right old saints of the Christian faith and life. And because I have come to this, I must report what I have learned from the histories. St. Bernard was abbot for 36 years, and in the same years he founded 160 monasteries of his order. Now it is well known what Cistercienses are for monasteries, whether they were perhaps lesser at that time, but are now pure principalities; and I want to say even more: At the same time, when under Emperor Heinrich 3. 4. 5., within twenty years, four different princely monastic orders arose, as Grandimotenses, Canonici regulares reformed, Carthusians and Cistercians. What will have happened after that in the four hundred years up to us? Truly, one might say, it has rained and snowed monks. And it is no wonder that no town or village would have remained without a monastery or two, would be at least a terminarius or 8tatiowi-ius. The Histories chide Emperor Valentinianum for using the monks for war. Yes, dear, the idle people wanted to become too many, as one also ran of some kings in France that they had to forbid to become monks, especially the serfs. For they sought liberty under the caps, and ran all into monasteries.

The world wants to be deceived. If you want to catch a lot of birds and birds of prey, you have to put an owl or an owl on a stick or a glue stick, and that is how it is done. So also, if the devil wants to see the Christians, he must put a monk's cap, or (as Christ calls it [Matth. 6, 16.]) a sour hypocritical face, we are then much more astonished at such owls and owls, neither of the right suffering, blood, wounds, death, and resurrection, which we see and hear in Christ our Lord, passed away for our sin; falling therefore with heaps and all power from the Christian faith upon the new sanctities, that is, to the devil in his clover and glue. For we must always have something new; Christ's death and resurrection, faith and love, are old and now common things, therefore they must no longer count for anything, but new earbrows (as St. Paul says [2 Tim. 4:3.]) we must have. And it happens to us, because our ears are so sore that we can no longer bear the old true truth, ut aeervemus, that we load great heaps of new doctrines on uus. As then hath happened, and shall continue to happen. For the following Conciliarities, especially the Papal Conciliarities (for afterwards they are almost all Papal Conciliarities), have not only left such new good works undamned, but have raised them high above the old good works in all the world, so that the pope has also canonized or exalted many saints from the monastic orders.

In the beginning it was and still is beautiful to look at, but in the end it becomes a horrible, monstrous thing, since everyone adds to it from day to day. The beginning of St. Francis was beautiful to look at, but now it has become so coarse that they even put on the caps of the dead, in which the dead are to be blessed. Is't not a terrible thing to hear? Ay, so it is; when one begineth to fall from Christ and falls, one cannot stop. What happened in our time in the Low Countries, when Mrs. Margaret ordered after her death that she should be made a standard. This was done. She was dressed in nun's clothes, seated over a table, given food and drink, and given credence, as if she were a princess; then she atoned for her sin and became a holy nun. But when it had lasted some days, and the pious Emperor Carol heard of it, he had it abolished. If he had not done so, I think that such an example would have spread throughout the world. This is what the new holiness does, and this is what the new holiness must do, which wants to do better than the true old Christian holiness: it does not deceive in this way, but remains, and always practices faith, love, humility, discipline, patience, etc., so that nothing monstrous is seen in it, but only lovely, blissful, quiet, clean, useful examples that please God and man. But the new holiness rumbles with strange, new gestures, so that they lure the careless souls to themselves, pretending great things, and yet there is nothing behind them, as St. Peter writes [2 Petr. 2, 14-18].

Item 214: Gerson writes of the Carthusians that they are right in keeping so rigidly to their rule that they eat no meat if they must die at once. Well then, if a pious physician notices here that the sick person could be helped with a chicken broth or a morsel of meat, and not otherwise, the physician is not followed, but the sick person must die sooner. I praise St. Augustine for this, who writes in his rule that one should ask the physician's advice, and says: they are not all of the same fortune, therefore one should not keep them all alike. This is a right beautiful epiikia ("imL-xer"), do not force them to remain eternally either. For it is not a monastery, but a free society of several priests. D. Staupitz once told me that he had heard from the Bishop of Worms, who was a Dalbergian, that if St. Augustine had written nothing else but the Rule, one would still have to say that he had been an excellent wise man. This is also true. For he would have considered such Carthusians to be murderers in the highest degree, and their monasteries to be real physical murder pits (as they are then in the truth) are damned. In Erfurt myself, in the Carthusian monastery, I saw a sick man walking on a crutch, who was still young; I asked him if he was not being kept from the choir and the guard? No, he said wisely, I must go away.

(215) But it is done unto us aright. God has sent us His Son to be our Teacher and Savior: 1) Not content with this, He Himself preaches to us all from His high heavenly throne, saying [Matt. 17:5], "Hail to you, hear this one. Then we should fall down with the apostles, and let it seem to us that we "hear" nothing else in all the world; so we let Father and Son preach in vain, and go away and invent our own sermon. Thus it is, as the 81st Psalm, v. 12, 13, says: "My people will not hearken unto my voice; so will I let them go after their heart's conceit." Hence then come such beautiful Ittislotbreskise and ^ pbiäise, Col. 2, 23. self-chosen spirituality and unmercifulness over our own bodies, that we thus put ourselves to death, when yet God has commanded that one should care for the body, and not kill. Do you not think that if, according to St. Augustine's rule and St. Paul's teaching [Rom. 13:14], the physicians had been allowed to give counsel over the bodies of the clergy, especially of women, many a fine person would have been helped who otherwise would have had to go mad or die, as daily experience has taught us? But it was the time of wrath that the new and great holiness had to reign as a punishment to the world.

(216) Fifthly, a council has no power to impose new ceremonies on Christians, in the case of mortal sin, or in the case of driving the conscience, as fast days, feast days, food, drink, clothing. But where they do so, St. Augustine stands sä äsnusrium, saying, 8oe Zenus übers, " bsbet vbserstvines; and Christ hath given few ceremonies. For because they have not power to call it, we have power to forbear it; yea, we are forbidden to keep it by St. Paul Col. 2:16: "Be not conscience of any part of the days, and fastings, meat, or drink," 2c.

217. sixth, a concilium has power, and is guilty of condemning such ceremonies according to the Scriptures; for they are unchristian, and set up a new idolatry or worship, which is not commanded by God, but forbidden.

1) Erlanger (2nd): "assistance".

The seventh is that a council has no power to interfere with worldly rights and government. 2c. For St. Paul says [2 Tim. 2, 4] that he who wants to serve God in spiritual warfare should abstain from worldly affairs.

219. eighthly, a concilium has power, and is bound, to condemn such manner made, or new rights, according to the holy scripture, that is, to cast the pope's decree into the fire.

(220) Ninthly, a council hath no power to make such statutes or decrees as seek nothing more than tyranny; that is, as the bishops shall have power and authority to command what they will, and every man must tremble and be obedient. But hath power, and is guilty of condemning such things, according to the holy scripture, 1 Pet. 5:3. "Shall not rule over the people;" and Christ [Luc. 22:26.], "Vos non sic:" he that will be chief, let him be your servant."

(221) Tenthly, a council has power to establish certain ceremonies, with this difference: first, that they do not strengthen the tyranny of the bishops. Secondly, that they be necessary and useful to the people, and give a fine and orderly discipline and character. As, it is necessary to have certain days, also places, where one can meet; likewise certain hours to preach and to publicly offer the Sacramenta, and to pray, sing, praise God and give thanks 2c. As St. Paul says 1 Cor. 14, 40. "Let all things be done orderly and honestly." With such pieces, not the tyranny of the bishops is sought, but merely the need, benefit, and order of the people. And, to sum it up, one must have it, and cannot do without it, if the church is to remain otherwise.

022 But if any man, by reason of necessity, sickness, impediment, or whatsoever it may be, cannot at times keep such things, it need not be sin. For it is for his benefit, and not for the bishop's. If he is a Christian, he will not seek his own harm in this. What doth God ask of him that will not be with such a company or such a company?

find. And to sum up, he who is a Christian is not bound by such an order; he would rather do it than leave it, where he can be unhindered. Therefore no law can be laid down for him here; he would rather will and do more than such a law demands. But let him who arrogantly, proudly, and wantonly despises such a law. For such a one will despise a higher law, whether it be the law of God or the law of man.

(223) Perhaps you would like to say here: What do you want to make of the conciliums in the end, if you want to curtail them so much? In that way would a pastor, even a pedagogue, have more power over his pupils than a council has over the churches? I answer: Do you also think that a pastor or a schoolmaster is such a small office that they cannot be compared to the concilii? If there were no parish priests or bishops, where would one gather a concilium? If there were no schools, where would one take pastors? I am speaking of such schoolmasters as not only teach the children and youth arts, but also draw them to Christian doctrine, and faithfully instruct them; and likewise of such pastors as faithfully and purely teach the word of God. For I will easily prove that the poor, lowly pastor of Hippon, St. Augustine, taught more than all the Conciliarities (for fear of the most holy popes in Rome I will remain silent). I will say more: There is more in the infant faith, neither in all concilia. So teach also the Lord's Prayer and ten commandments more, neither do all concilia teach. For this they do not teach, but prevent that nothing new be preached contrary to the old teachings. Help God, how shall the papists wring out these words from me, shout them down, grind them up, and destroy them, but let my reasons stand beside them, why I have spoken thus. For they are pious, honest people, who can do nothing but calumniate and lie, of which I should be justly afraid. But God will not forgive me, for I cannot do it, and I will let them blaspheme and lie.

224. But let us, thou and I, speak one to another of the matter. What then can a Concilium do? or what is its work? Hear thou thyself their own words, Anathematica.

Their office is called, we condemn. Yes, they speak much more demurely, und do not say, we condemn; but so they say: Anathe*matizat Ecclesia*, the holy Christian church condemned. The condemnation of the Concilii should not frighten me, but the condemnation of the holy church would kill me in a moment, for the sake of the man who says [Matt. 28:20], "I am with you to the end of the world"; oh! the man's condemnation is not to be suffered. But the Concilia, because they put on the holy Christian church, as the right high judge on earth, bear witness that they are not judges of their own pleasure, but the church, as the holy Scripture preaches, believes, and confesses, as we shall hear. Just as a thief or a murderer would remain in the presence of the judge for his own sake, but the law and the land are held together by the judge as their servant, and he must be afraid of the two.

(1) 225 A concilium, then, is nothing else than a consistory, court of justice, court of review, or the like, in which the judges pronounce judgment after interrogating the parties, but with such humility: by right, that is, our office is anathematizare, condemn. But not according to our head nor will, or new invented law, but according to the old law, which is held to be law in the whole realm. So a concilium also condemns a heretic, not according to their conceit, but according to the law of the realm, that is, according to the holy Scriptures, as they confess, which is the law of the holy church. Such law, kingdom, and judge are truly to be feared for eternal damnation. For such law is the word of God, the kingdom is the church of God, and the judge is the minister or servant of both.

226 Such a minister or judge of this law and kingdom is not only the council, but also every pastor and schoolmaster. For this reason, a council cannot be in perpetual need of such a magistrate's office. For the bishops cannot remain eternally assembled together, but must come together only at certain times of need, and

1) Here the Wittenberg and Jena editions have for the second time the superscription: "What a Concilium is."

Anathematize, or be a judge. As when an Arius of Alexandria becomes too powerful for his pastor or bishop, seizes the people, and mixes in other pastors and people in the country, the pastor of Alexandria is defeated, and his magistracy can no longer defend the law of this realm, that is, the true Christian faith: In such distress and at such time the other pastors and bishops shall run with all their might, and help the pastor of Alexandria against Arius to defend the right faith, and condemn Arius for the salvation of the others, so that the misery may not entirely prevail. And where the parish priests are not able to come, the pious emperor Constantine should also do this with his power, and help the bishops together. Just as when a fire breaks out, if the owner of the house alone cannot extinguish it, all the neighbors should run to help extinguish it; and if they do not run to help, the authorities should help and command that they must run to help, and anathematize or condemn the fire to save the other houses.

227 So then the Concilium is the great minister or judge in this kingdom and law; but when the emergency is over, he has finished his office. Just as in the temporal government, the high, great judges must do this when the lower, smaller courts are too weak to resist the evil, until it finally comes to the highest, greatest court, the Imperial Diet, which also cannot be eternal, but must, when the emergency is over, draw apart again and leave the matters to the lower courts. But it happens at the imperial diets that it is sometimes necessary to establish new or more rights, to change and improve the old ones, or even to abolish them, and it is not possible to speak eternally according to an eternal law. For it is a temporal government that governs temporal things, which change and change; therefore the rights that are set for such changeable things must also change. For if the thing on which the law is based is no longer there, then the law is also no longer there. Just as the city of Rome no longer has the status and character that it had before, so the rights that were based on them are dead and no longer apply. nothing more. Transient thing has transient right.

But in this kingdom of the church it is thus said: "God's word abideth for ever" [Isaiah 40:8], according to which one must judge, and not make new or different God's word, set new or different articles of faith. Therefore pastors and schoolmasters are the lowly, but daily, permanent, eternal judges, who anathematize without ceasing, that is, ward off the devil and his ravings. A concilium, as a great judge, must make pious or kill old, great husks, but cannot beget others. A priest and a schoolmaster have to deal with small, young peelers, and always beget new people for bishops and concilia, where it is necessary. A council cuts down the large branches of the trees, or even rots out the evil trees. But a priest and a schoolmaster plant and beget vain young trees and spicebushes in the garden. O, they have a precious office and work, and are the noblest jewels of the churches; they preserve the churches. Therefore let all lords do their best to preserve the parish priests and schools. For while we cannot have the churches, the parishes and schools, though small, are eternal and useful churches.

(229) It is evident how seriously the ancient emperors meant the parishes and schools, since they so richly endowed the monasteries. For these names, Provost, Dean, Scholasticus, Cantor, Canonici, Vicarii, Custos 2c. testify that there were schools in the first place. But what has become of it? Oh Lord God! that they would still want to do something, remain what they are, keep what they have, be princes and lords, but again set up lectures, and force the canons, vicars, choir students, that they hear a lecture in the Holy Scriptures every day, so that it would again have some form of a school, so that one could have pastors and bishops, and thus help to govern the churches. O Lord God, how immeasurably great good they could do for the church, and God would well grant them their wealth or power and leave it to them, where they would otherwise also improve their shameful lives. But such our sighing and lamenting is in vain. There is no

Hearing nor seeing makes the parishes desolate, and the people without God's word become raw and savage. I have heard it said by people whom I must believe that in many dioceses two hundred, three hundred, four hundred good parishes stand empty. Is that not a terribly cruel thing to hear among Christians? Have mercy on God in heaven! and hear our miserable sighing and lamenting, amen.

230 And that we also come once from the concilia, I think that from this one should be able to understand what a concilium is, what its right, power, office, and work is; also which concilia are true or false concilia, namely, that they should confess and defend the old faith against the new articles of faith, and not set new articles of faith against the old faith, nor set new good works against the old good works, but defend the old good works against the new good works. But he who defends the old faith against the new faith also defends the old good works against the new good works. For as the faith is, so are the fruits or good works, without which the two Conciliates did not see such a consequence, or else they would have condemned the Archimandrite Eutycheu not only on account of faith (which they sincerely did), but also on account of fine monasticism (which they did not do), but rather have confirmed, thereby testifying that they themselves also have wicked vialsetiei, giving a ^ntsosāsns, and not giving the Ooiws^usns, according to the common plague of all the world, and have just the defect in good works which Nestorius and Eutycheu had in faith. This much is said: God will not only make us children in faith, but will also make us fools in vialsotioa, and reckon us vain Nestorius and Eutycheu, that he may humble us. For though Nestorius and Eutycheu may be condemned in theologia, yet their lazy dialectica remains always in the world, as it has been from the beginning, that one holds the^ntsoscksns and leaves oonssgusus. And what will you say much? If thou hast all the Concilia, yet thereby thou art not a Christian, they give too little. Though thou hast all the fathers, yet they give thee not enough; yet thou must look into the holy scriptures, wherein it is all is abundantly given, or in the Catechismum, since it is briefly given, and also far more neither is found in all the Concilia and Fathers.

Finally, a council should have to do only with matters of faith, and that when faith is in need. For public evil works may well be condemned at home by the secular rulers, priests, and parents, and the good ones may be administered. But false good works also belong to the things of faith, as they corrupt the true faith; therefore, where the pastors are too weak, they also belong to the concilium. Although the Concilia (as I have said) did not concern themselves with this, without one or two small Concilia, as that of Gangra, of which we have said above. The ceremonies should even be left out of the conciliis at home in the parishes, even in the schools, that the schoolmaster would be Magister Ceremouiarum next to the parish priest. For from the pupils the others all learn it, without all the essays and effort.

232. So what, when, and how the disciples sing or pray in church, the multitude learn afterward; and what they sing over the dead body, or at the grave, the rest learn also; when they kneel down, and fold their hands, as the schoolmaster taps with the rod while they sing: Et homo factus est, so do the multitude afterwards; when they take off their little hats, or bend their knees, as often as the name of Jesus Christ is called, and what they practice more of the same Christian discipline and deeds, that the multitude also do afterwards without preaching, as if moved by living examples. All ceremonies, even under the pope, have come from the schools and parishes, without which the pope has sought his tyranny, with food, fasting, celebrations 2c. But here one must also see to it that the ceremonies do not become too much in the end. First of all, however, one must see to it that they are not considered necessary for salvation, but serve only for outward discipline and order, which may be changed every hour, and are not commanded in the church for eternal rights (as the pope does), and are written in the books with tyrannical dread. For it is altogether an outward, corruptible, changeable thing.

233 Therefore, in our time, we would have things that would be more than important and worthy enough to gather a concilium. For we poor, miserable, weak believers, and unfortunately real Niscrzi, that is, lazy Christians, who are still left, would have to sue the pope, along with his own, for the article of St. Peter, of which we heard above, that it is called God's temptation, where the believers are burdened with infallible burdens, which neither we nor our ancestors (but especially the pope with his own, does not want to touch with a finger) have been able to bear [Apost. 15, 10.]. Although St. Peter speaks of the Law of Moses, which God Himself commanded, yet the pope has oppressed us with his foul, filthy, and stinking burdens, so that the holy church has had to be his secret chamber, and what has gone down and up from it have had to worship for God; also that he has not set fire to one or two, like Arius and his like, but the whole Christian church, and burned it, so that he has destroyed the old right article of faith of St. Peter to the ground. Peter to the ground, as much as was in him. For that we (as St. Peter testifies, v. 11.) must be saved by the grace of Christ alone, as all Christendom from the beginning of the world, all the patriarchs, prophets, kings, saints, 2c. have been, is called heresy, and has from the beginning always condemned the same article for and for, nor can it cease.

Here we call and cry for a concilium, and ask all Christendom for counsel and help against this arch-church-burner and murderer of Christians, that we may have this article of St. Peter again. But we ask that no Nestorian or Eutychian Dialectica be used here, which gives or confesses one part, but denies the consequent or other part. We desire the whole article to be round and pure, as it is set by St. Peter, and taught by St. Paul, namely, that in doing so one also condemn everything that follows from this article to be condemned; or as St. Peter calls it: the infallible, impossible burden, and St. Augustine: the innumerable burden, loaded on the church by bishops. For what is the use, if mau already gives the first piece, that it is true, that we are saved by grace alone?

Christ must be justified and saved, and yet does not let the other part follow, which must follow from it. As when St. Paul saith [Rom. 11:6], If it be grace, it is not works; if it be works, it is not grace; and St. Peter, If it be grace, it is not the infallible burden; if it be the infallible burden, it is not the grace of Christ, which is called trying God. St. Augustine also, since Christ wished to burden the churches with a few ceremonies, or rather to have them free, did not wish to have them oppressed by the innumerable burdens of the bishops; that the church is worse off, neither the Jews, who were burdened by God's laws, and not (like the church) by human, presumptuous, sacrilegious essays.

(235) Such a dialectica of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Augustine, we want to have, which is the dialectica of the Holy Spirit, which is whole, and not divided into nestoric parts, or one alone wants to be true, and the other, which must also be true from it, does not want to be true. Otherwise it would be the same, as it is written of certain kings of Israel and Judah, 1) that they did indeed perform the right worship, but they did not remove the high places or other altars and services. Which the prophet Elijah calleth, Limping in both parts [1 Kings 19:21]. We Germans call it: to make two brothers in law with one sister. So they wanted to give one people two different Gods, or if they almost reformed, they also wanted to leave a strange god beside the one God. For they were also coarse Nestorian Dialcctici, who professed that one alone must worship one God, and yet did not see that it must follow from this, nor let it follow that all other gods must be absent, or could not have the one God. Therefore, in the Concilio, desired by us, we do not want to suffer a nestorium, who gives us one thing and takes away another, with whom we also cannot keep that which he gives, and is a right giver-taker. For where we are given that the grace of Christ alone makes us blessed, and not also given the consequence and emphasis that works do not make us blessed, but will

1) So only in Walch; in the other editions: "Jüden".

If we retain that works are necessary for satisfaction or for righteousness, we are deprived of the first thing that was given to us, namely, that grace alone without works makes us blessed; then we retain nothing, and have become worse.

I will speak in German: In the Concilio, the pope is not only to renounce all his tyranny of human commandments, but also to hold with us that even good works, done according to God's commandments, cannot help to righteousness, to eradicate sin, to obtain God's grace, but only faith in Christ, who is a king of righteousness in us, by his own blood, death, and resurrection, that he might put away sin for us, be sufficient for us, reconcile us to God, and deliver us from death, wrath, and hell. Therefore he shall condemn and burn all his bulls, decrees, books of indulgences, purgatory, monasteries, saints' service, pilgrimages, together with all innumerable lies and idolatries, as they are raging against this article of St. Peter's; he shall also restore everything that he has bought, stolen, robbed, plundered or acquired with it, especially his false primacy, which he boasts is so necessary that no one can be saved who is not subject to him. For the pope's hat died not for my sin, neither is Christ called; and all Christians before him, and under him, have been sanctified and saved without his hat.

(237) This, I think, is a matter of sufficient importance to warrant a stately, sharp, and mighty concilium. Emperors and kings should help here, and force the pope, if he does not want to, to do so, as the emperors have done in the four main concilia. But not all bishops, abbots, monks, doctors, and the useless bunch of huddlers and the big crowd would have to come there, otherwise it would be such a concilium, since the first year would be spent with the arrival, with bickering, which one should sit at the top, go behind or in front; the other year with parading, pewing, running, and stabbing; the third year with other things, or also with burning, for instance of John Hus or two, and such a fare be done, that a campaign against the Turk may be made with it.

would like to keep. Rather, one would have to call for people from all countries who are thoroughly learned in the holy Scriptures and who also seriously and wholeheartedly mean God's glory, the Christian faith, the church, the salvation of souls, and the peace of the world. Among them are some of the secular class (for it also concerns them), who would also be understanding and faithful. As if Mr. Hans von Schwarzenberg were alive, one would know to trust him or his peers. And it would be enough if there were three hundred of them everywhere, select people, since one would like to put country and people on it: just as the first Concilium, which from all the countries that now the Turk and our monarchs have, had no more than three hundred and eighteen, and yet seventeen were false and Arians. The other, at Constantinople, had one hundred and fifty. The third, at Ephesus, two hundred. The fourth, at Chalcedon, had six hundred and thirty, almost as many as all the others, and yet they were not at all like the fathers at Nicea and Constantinople.

(238) Nor would it be necessary to take up the affairs of all countries, which no one else can or will judge, even old, decayed, evil affairs, and to throw them all upon the neck of the Council. A Constantine would have to be there who would take up such matters and throw them all into the fire, would have them judged and decided at home in the countries, but would have to take up the matter and get the most beneficial result. There the Pope's heresy, even abomination, would be publicly read piece by piece, as it is all against St. Peter's Articles and against the old right Christian faith of the church, which has held St. Peter's Articles from the beginning of the world, and would be condemned immediately 2c.

Yea, saith thou, such a concilium is never to be hoped for. I think so myself. But if one wants to speak of it, and desire or wish for a council, then one must desire such a council, or even let it go, and desire none, and keep silent. For such a council was held the first at Nicea, and the other at Constantinople; which examples it would be reasonable to follow. And therefore show that emperors and kings, because they are Christians, would be obliged to gather such a council for the salvation of many thousand souls whom the pope has destroyed with his tyranny and

They are all those who could come to St. Peter's Articles and to the right old Christian faith by means of a concilium, and who must otherwise be lost. For they cannot get this doctrine of St. Peter, because they neither hear nor see anything of it.

240 And even if other monarchs did not want to join the main council, Emperor Carolus and the German princes could still hold a provincial in German lands. And that some think that it would become a schism: who knows, if we did our part, and earnestly sought God's honor and the salvation of souls, God might yet turn the hearts of the other monarchs so that in time they would praise and accept such a conciliar judgment. For it could not happen suddenly. But if Germany were to accept it, it would have to resound in other countries as well, where it cannot, or can hardly, come without such a great preacher as the Council is and has a strong voice that is heard from afar.

241 Well then, if we must despair of a concilio, let it be ordered to the right judge, our merciful God. However, we want to promote the small Concilia and the young Concilia, that is, parishes and schools, and let St. Peter's articles be pushed and preserved in every possible way, against all the damned new articles of faith and new good works that the pope has washed into the world. I will comfort myself when I see the children going into bishops' larvae, and think that God makes and will make such playful bishops to be right bishops, again considering those who should be right bishops according to their name to be vain playful bishops and mockers of His Majesty, as Moses says [Deut. 32, 21.], "I will provoke them to anger with that which is not my people, and to vomit with a foolish people, because they have provoked me to anger with that which is not GOD." It is not his first to reject bishops, he hath thrust it in Hosea [Cap. 4, 6.], "Thou castest away doctrine, and I will cast thee away again, that thou be not my priest." Li iLetum est ita, et üt ita. Let that be enough of the conciliarities, now let us speak of the church in the end also.

The third part, of the church. 1)

024 As they cry of the fathers and conciliarities, and know not what the fathers and conciliarities are, but only want to cover us up with empty letters, so they cry also of the church. But that they should say what, who, where the church is, they would not do so much service, neither to the church nor to God, that they would ask or seek after it. They like to be taken for the church, as pope, cardinals, bishops, and yet let them be vain disciples of the devil under this glorious name, who would practice nothing but vain deceit and mischievousness. Well then, putting aside various writings and divisions of the word church, let us this time remain simple-mindedly with the child's faith, which says: "I believe in a holy Christian church, the communion of saints." Then faith plainly signifies what the church is, namely, a communion of saints, that is, a multitude or collection of such people as are Christians and holy; that is, a Christian holy multitude or church. But this word "church" is with us especially un-German, and does not give the sense or thought which must be taken from the article.

243. for Apost. 19, 39. 40. the chancellor ^6ol68iam calls the congregation or people, who had run to the market at home, saying, "It may be done in a proper congregation." Item, when he had said this, he let the congregation go. In these and other places the name ^6ol68w, or church, means nothing else than a gathered people, whether they were Gentiles or not Christians, just as the rulers of the council call their congregation to the council house. Now there are many nations in the world, but the Christians are a peculiarly called people, and are not badly called LoolvZia, church, or people, but Kanota, Oatbolioa, Ebrwtiana, that is, a Christian holy people, who believe in Christ, wherefore they are called a Christian people, and have the Holy Ghost, which sanctifieth them daily, not only by the remission of sins, which Christ hath purchased for them (as the antinomians fool), but also by the putting away, sweeping out, and killing of sins, whereof they are called a Christian people.

1) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

holy people. And now "holy Christian church" is so much as a people that are Christians and holy, or as one is also wont to speak, holy Christendom; item, the whole of Christendom. 1) In the Old Testament it is called God's people.

244 And if such words had been used in infancy, I believe that there was a holy Christian people, then all the misery that has been torn down under the blind, unclear word "church" could easily have been avoided. For the word "holy Christian people" would have brought with it clearly and powerfully both understanding and judgment as to what is or is not the church. For whoever had heard this word: Christian holy people, would have been able to judge immediately: The pope is not a people, much less a holy Christian people. So also the bishops, priests, and monks, they are not a holy Christian people; for they believe not in Christ, neither do they live holy, but are the devil's evil, shameful people. For he that believeth not in Christ is not a Christian, neither is he a Christian. He that hath not the Holy Ghost against sin is not holy. Therefore they cannot be a holy Christian people, that is, Sancta et Catholica Ecclesia.

(245) But because we use this blind word "church" in infantile faith, the common man falls upon the stone house which is called the church, as the painters paint it; or else they paint the apostles, disciples, and the mother of God, as on the day of Pentecost, and the Holy Ghost hovering above. This is still possible; but this is only a time of holy Christian people, as in the beginning. But Ecclesia shall be called the holy Christian people, not only in the time of the apostles, who are now long dead, but unto the end of the world. That therefore there should always be on earth in life a holy Christian people, in whom Christ lives, works, and reigns, per roāomptionom, by grace and forgiveness of sins, and the Holy Spirit per vivificationem et sanctiueatioiwm, by daily sweeping away of sins, and renewing of life, that we may not abide in sins, but may and ought to lead a new life in all kinds of good works, and not in old evil works, such as the ten commandments, or two tables.

1) The words: "item, all Christendom" are missing in the second edition of the Erlangen edition.

This is the doctrine of St. Paul. But the pope with his own has drawn both, name and image of the church, from himself alone and from his shameful, cursed houses, under the blind word Loeiosia, church 2c.

024 But they themselves give them the right name, when they call themselves Leoiesia, or Uoumna, or Kaneta, and do not add to them, as they cannot, Oatüolioa. For Loelesia is called a people; that is what they are, just as the Turk is also Loolesia, a people. Leelosia Romana is called a Roman people, which they are, and indeed much more Roman than the heathen were Roman before. Leolosia Uomana saneta, is called a holy Roman nation; so they are, for they have invented a much greater holiness than the holiness of Christians, or that of the holy Christian nation. For their holiness is a Roman holiness comaaae L66l68M6, the Roman people's holiness, and are now also called Lauetissimi, Laerosaneti, the most holy; as Virgilius speaks, saora 1ani68, 8Ä6ra Ü08tia, and Plautus, omaiuia 8ao6rrui8. For Christian holiness they cannot suffer. Therefore they cannot have the name Christian church or Christian people, also for the cause that Christian church and Christian holiness is a common name and common thing to all churches and Christians in the world, wherefore it is called Oatüolwum. But they esteem such a common name and holiness little and almost nothing, but have devised a special, higher, different, better holiness before others, which shall be called LaiwtitsK Uomaua, 6t ^66l68ia6 Uomariae 8anetita8, that is, Roman holiness, and the Roman people's holiness.

For Christian holiness, or common Christian holiness, is when the Holy Spirit gives people faith in Christ, and thereby sanctifies them, Acts 15:9. 15:9, that is, he makes new heart, soul, body, work, and being, and writes the commandments of God not on tables of stone, but on hearts of flesh, 2 Cor. 3:3. As if I speak rudely: after the first tablet he gives right knowledge of God, so that they, enlightened by him with right faith, may resist all heresies, overcome all false thoughts and error, and thus be pure in faith against the devil.

remain. He also gives strength and comforts the stupid, despondent, weak consciences against the accusation and temptation of sins, so that the souls do not despair or despair, nor are they afraid of the torture, torment, death, wrath and judgment of God, but are strengthened in hope and confidently, boldly and cheerfully overcome the devil. He also gives us a right fear and love of God, so that we will not despise God, nor grumble or be angry against His strange judgments, but will love, praise, thank and honor Him in everything that happens, good or bad. This is called a new and holy life in the soul, according to the first table of Moses. It is also called tres virtutes LotoZioas, the three principal virtues of Christians, as, faith, hope, love [1 Cor. 13:13.], and the Holy Ghost, which giveth, doeth, and worketh these things (purchased for us by Christ), is therefore called 8o,v6tiÜ6Ltor, or Vivikieo-tor. For the old Adam is dead, and cannot do it, and must learn it by the law, that he cannot do it, and is dead; otherwise he would not know it of himself.

248 In the other table, and after the body, he sanctifieth Christians also, and ordaineth that they be willingly obedient to parents and overlords, peaceable, humble, not angry, nor revengeful, nor malicious, but patient, kind, servile, brotherly, lovely, not unchaste, adulterous, licentious, but chaste, chaste with wife, child, and servants, or without wife and child. So then, not stealing, usury, stinginess, translating, 2c., but honestly working, honestly feeding, gladly lending, giving, helping where they can; so not lying, deceiving, asterreden, but being kind, truthful, faithful, and constant, and what more is required in the commandments of God. This is done by the Holy Spirit, who sanctifies and awakens the body to this new life, until it is accomplished in that life. And this is called Christian holiness. And such people must always be on earth, and should be only two or three, or the children alone. Alas, there are few of the aged. And those that are not, let them not count themselves Christians, neither let them be comforted as if they were Christians, by much talk of the forgiveness of sins and graces of Christ, as the antinomians do.

0249 For these, after they have rejected the ten commandments, and understand them not, preach many things concerning the grace of Christ, but strengthen and comfort them that abide in sins, that they fear not, nor be afraid of sins: for they are all gone through Christ: and yet they see and suffer men to walk in public sins, without any amendment or correction of their lives. From this it is evident that they do not understand the faith and Christ aright, and by that very fact do away with them when they preach it. For how can he speak rightly of the works of the Holy Spirit in the first table, of consolation, grace, and forgiveness of sins, who neither respects nor does the works of the Holy Spirit in the other table, which he can understand and experience, but has never tried or experienced. Wherefore it is certain that they neither have nor understand Christ nor the Holy Ghost, and their babblings are a loud foam of the tongue, and as said, are true Nestorii and Eutyches, who confess or teach Christ in ^nteoeäenti, in dex substance, and yet deny in Oonse^uenti or Jdiomaten, that is, they teach Christ, and destroy Christ by teaching him.

250 Now this is said of Christian holiness; which the pope will not have, but must have a peculiar one, which is much holier, that is, to teach casel, plates, caps, garments, food, feasts, days, monasticism, nunnery, masses, saints' service, and other more innumerable things of outward, corruptible, perishable things. Whether one lives among them without faith, fear of God, hope, love, and what the Holy Spirit works according to the first table, but instead with unbelief, uncertain hearts, doubting, contempt of God, impatience with God, false trust in works (that is, idolatry), and not in the grace of Christ, nor on his merit, but does enough even by works, also sells excess to others, and for this takes all the world's goods and money as well deserved: All these things hinder not, but may be more holy, neither is Christian holiness itself.

0251 So, in the other table, there is no harm in their teaching disobedience to parents and overlords, in their murdering, warring, agitating, envying, hating, avenging, being unchaste, lying, steal, usurp, deceive, and do all folly to the utmost; only throw a surpise over thy head, and thou art holy, according to the holiness of the Roman church; thou mayest well be blessed without Christian holiness. But let us go idle of the foul people (yet it is in vain what we do to them; Venit ira Dei super 608 in üueiu, as St. Paul saith (1 Thess. 2:16?), 1) and talk with us of the church.

(252) Now the infant faith teacheth us, as I have said, that a holy Christian people must be and remain on the earth unto the end of the world. For it is an article of faith, which cannot cease till it come to believe; as Christ promises [Matt. 28:20], "I am with you unto the end of the world." Wherefore will or can any poor erring man perceive where such Christian holy people are in the world? For they believe that a heavenly being and eternal life will come, but they do not yet have it; therefore they must still be in this life and in this world, and remain until the end of the world. For it says, "I believe another life," and thus confesses that it is not yet in the same life, but believes, hopes, and loves it as its right fatherland and life; meanwhile it must remain in misery and wait, as they sing in the song of the Holy Spirit, "When we go home from this misery, Kyrieleys." This is to be spoken of.

By what signs the Christian church is to be recognized. 2)

253 First of all, this holy Christian people is to know where they have the holy word of God. Although it is unequal, as St. Paul says (1 Cor. 3:12, 13), "Some are pure, and some are not pure. Those who have it pure are called those who build gold, silver, and precious stones on the ground; those who have it impure are called those who build hay, straw, and wood on the ground, but are saved by fire, of which more than enough has been said above.

1) These brackets are put by us to make sense.

2) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

This is the main part and the high main sanctity, of which the Christian people is called holy. For the word of God is holy, and sanctifies all that it toucheth; yea, it is the holiness of God himself, Rom. 1:16: "It is the power of God which maketh blessed all them that believe;" and 1 Tim. 4:5: "All things are sanctified by the word and prayer." For the Holy Spirit conducts it himself, and anoints or sanctifies the church, that is, the Christian holy people with it, and not with the chrism of the pope, that he may anoint or sanctify fingers, garments, skirts, chalice, and stones. For the same pieces never learn to love God, to believe, to praise, to be piously fine. Let them adorn the maggot sack, and then tear and rot with Chresem and holiness, as much as is in it, along with the maggot sack.

254 But this sanctuary is the right sanctuary, 3) the right ointment, which anoints unto eternal life, when thou canst neither have a pope's crown, nor a bishop's hat, but must live and die naked in the body; even as babes (and we all) are baptized naked, and without any raiment. But we speak full of the outward word, preached by men, as by thee and me, orally. For Christ hath left these things behind him, as an outward sign, whereby his church, or his holy Christian people, should be known in the world. We also speak of such an oral word, when it is earnestly believed, and publicly confessed before the world, as he saith [Matt. 10:32, 33. Luc. 12:8.], "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess before my Father and his angels." For many there be that know it secretly, but will not confess it. Many there be that believe it not, nor do it. For few there be that believe, and do it. As the parable of the seed, Matt. 13:4, saith, that it bringeth forth and hath four parts of the field, but the fourth part only, the goodly good field, bringeth forth fruit in patience.

255 Wherefore thou hearest or seest such word preach, believe, confess, and do according to it, have no doubt that there must certainly be there a right ecclesis, sancta cratLolios-, a Christian holy people (1 Pet. 2, 9.), if

3) In the first edition: "Heilthum"; in the collections: "Heilighthum".

4) In the first edition and in Walch: "three".

They are very few. For the word of God does not go away alone, Isa. 55:11, but must have at least a fourth or a piece of the field. And if there were no other sign than this alone, it would still be sufficient to show that there must be a holy Christian people there. For the word of God cannot be without the people of God. Again, God's people cannot be without God's Word. Otherwise, who would want to preach it or hear it preached where there would be no people of God? And what could or would God's people believe where God's Word was not there?

256. And this is the piece that does all miracles, makes all things right, keeps all things, straightens all things, does all things, casts out all devils, as, pilgrimage devil, indulgence devil, bull devil, fraternity devil, saint devil, fair devil, purgatory devil, monastery devil, priest devil, red devil, sedition devil, heretic devil, all papal devils, also antinomian devils; but not without shouting and strife, as he shows in the poor men, Marc. 1, 23. 26. and 9, 26. No, he must leave a shouting and tearing behind him, if he is to go out, as is seen in Emser, Ecke, Rotzleffel, Schmid, Wezel, Töpel, Knebel, Filtz, Rültz, Säü, Esel, and the like of his shouters and writers, who are all the devil's mouth and limbs, through which he thus shouts and tears; but help 'em not, he must go out, and cannot suffer the power of the word. For they themselves confess that it is the word of God and the holy Scriptures, but it is better to have it from the fathers and the churches. Let them go; it is enough that we know how the main body, the main sanctuary, feasts, keeps, nourishes, strengthens, and protects the church, as St. Augustine also says: Loelesia verdo Dei Zeneratur, alitur, nutritur, roboratur. But they that persecute and condemn it call themselves by their own fruits.

257 Secondly, God's people, or the Christian holy people, are known by the holy sacrament of baptism, where they are taught, believed, and used according to Christ's order. For this is also a public sign and precious sanctuary, by which God's people are sanctified. For it is a holy bath of the new birth through the Holy Spirit [Titus 3:5], in which we are bathed, and are blessed by the Holy Spirit.

The Holy Spirit washes you from sins and death, but in the innocent, holy blood of the Lamb of God. Where thou seest such signs, know that the church or the holy Christian people must surely be there, whether the pope baptize thee not, or thou knowest nothing of his holiness and power; as the young children know nothing of it, without that, when they are grown up, they are sadly deceived from their baptism, as St. Peter complaineth, 2 Pet. 2:18: provoking by fornication them that were rightly escaped, and now walk in error 2c. Yea, neither be thou deceived as to who is the Baptist. For baptism is not of the baptizer, nor given unto him, but of him that is baptized, to whom it is instituted and given of God; even as the word of God is not of the preacher, (for he himself also shall hear and believe,) but of the disciple that heareth and believeth, to whom it is given.

258 Third, God's people, or a holy Christian people, are known by the holy sacrament of the altar, where it is properly administered, believed, and received according to Christ's institution. For it is also a public sign and precious sanctuary, left behind by Christ, by which his people are sanctified, so that they also practice and publicly confess that they are Christians, as they do with the word and with baptism. And you must not pay attention to anything here, if the pope does not say mass for you, consecrate you, confirm or anoint you, or put on a chasuble. You may well receive it without any clothes (as in a bed sick), without the outward discipline compelling you to cover yourself modestly and honestly; you must also ask nothing in this, whether you have a plate or are cured; Nor should you inquire whether you are male or female, young or old, as little as you inquire about all these things in baptism and preaching; it is enough that you are consecrated and consecrated with the high and holy creed of God, of the word of God and of baptism, and also of this sacrament; then you are highly and gloriously enough anointed and priestly clothed.

0259 Neither be thou deceived how holy the man is, or whether he be two women or not, that passeth it unto thee. For the sacrament is not of him that ministereth it, but of him to whom it is ministered.

Without him taking it himself. Then he is one who receives it, and it is given to him. Wherever you see such sacramental gifts being served in the proper manner, know that they are God's people. For as it was said of the Word above, where the Word of God is, there must the church be; so also, where baptism and sacrament are, there must God's people be, and again. For no one has, gives, practices, needs, or confesses such pieces of salvation, but God's people alone, though there are some false and unbelieving Christians secretly among them; but these do not profane God's people, especially because they are secret; for the church or God's people do not suffer the manifest ones among themselves, but punish and sanctify them also; or, if they will not, cast them out by the ban from the holy place, and count them heathen, Matt. 18:17.

260) Fourthly, the people of God, or holy Christians, are known by the keys which they use publicly; that is, as Christ set forth in Matt. 18:15, 16, where a Christian sinneth, that he should be punished; and if he amend not, he shall be bound, and cast out; and if he amend, he shall be absolved. These are the keys. Now the custom of the keys is twofold, public and special. For some are so stupid and despondent in their pleasures, if they are not publicly condemned, that they still cannot console themselves until they receive absolution from the priest in particular. Again, some are so hard on me that even in their hearts and before the priest they secretly do not want to forgive or remit sins. For this reason, the key must be used in all kinds of ways, both publicly and specially. Wherefore thou seest that sin is forgiven or punished in some persons, whether publicly or specially, know that God's people are there. For where God's people are not, there are not the keys; and where the keys are not, there are not God's people. For Christ left them behind, that there should be a public sign and sanctuary, whereby the Holy Spirit (purchased by Christ's death) might sanctify fallen sinners again, and "confess" the Christians that they are a holy people under Christ in this world. And those who do not want to be converted, "let them be sanctified again, so that the same from would be thrust out of such a holy people, that is, bound, and shut out by the key, as shall happen to the impenitent antinomians.

0261 Here turn not thou to the two keys of the pope, which he hath made two lock-picks for all kings' chests and crowns. For if he will not bind or punish sin, whether public or particular, let it be punished and bound in thy parish. If he will not loose it nor forgive it, let it be loosed and forgiven in thy parish. For his reserving or binding, his laxing or permitting, does not sanctify nor sanctify thee, because he cannot have the keys, but has vain lock-picks. The keys are not of the pope (as he teaches), but of the church, that is, of the people of Christ, the people of God, or the holy Christian people, as far as the whole world is, or where Christians are. 'Den' they cannot all be to Nom, unless the whole world were first to Rome, which will not be yet for a long time. Just as baptism, sacrament, the word of God, are not of the pope, but of the people of Christ, and are also called claves Ecclesiae, not claves Papae.

(262) Fifthly, the church is known externally to ordain or appoint ministers, or to have offices which it shall appoint. For one must have bishops, pastors, or preachers, who publicly and especially give, administer, and exercise the above-mentioned four parts or sanctuary, on account of and in the name of the church, but rather by the appointment of Christ, as St. Paul Eph. 4:11. says: ^o66pit äona in lloiniüdu, "he has given some to be apostles, prophets, evangelists, teachers, governors," 2c. For the whole multitude cannot do these things, but must command or be commanded by one. Otherwise, what would become of each one if he wanted to speak or hand out, and no one would yield to the other? It must be commanded to one alone, and let him 1) alone preach, baptize, absolve, and administer the sacrament; and the rest all be satisfied of it, and consent thereto. Wherefore when thou seest these things, be thou sure that they are the people of God, and the holy Christian people.

1) "him" is missing from the first edition,

263 But it is true, that in this piece the Holy Ghost hath excepted women, and children, and unfit men, but hath chosen only competent men, as it is read now and then in the epistles of St. Paul, that a bishop should be a man of doctrine, and of godliness, and of a woman [1 Tim. 3:2. In sum, it should be a skillful, chosen man, to whom children, wives, and other persons are not competent, although they are competent to hear God's word, to receive baptism, sacrament, absolution, and are true holy Christians, as St. Peter says [1 Ep. 3, 7]. For such a difference also is given by nature and God's creation, that women (much less children or fools) cannot nor ought to have any rule, as experience gives, and Moses 1 Mos. 3:16. says, "Thou shalt be subject to man"; but the gospel does not abrogate such natural right, but confirms it as God's order and creatures.

Here the pope will persuade me through his screamers and devils: 1) St. Paul says not only of pastors and preachers, but also of apostles, evangelists, prophets, and other high spiritual orders, therefore there must be higher orders in the church, neither are pastors and preachers. Where now, Domine Luther? Where shall I go? There I go: If they themselves become apostles, evangelists, prophets, or show me one, oh, what a fool I am! if they show me one among them who is worthy of a pupil in the school, or who knows as much about Christian doctrine and holy scripture as a maiden of seven years, then I will give myself up captive. Now I know for certain that an apostle, evangelist, and prophet can do more, or even as much, as a girl of seven years, I am speaking of the holy Scriptures and of faith, for that they can do more of the teachings of men, and also more of mischief, I believe very well, and more strongly than I believe in God, because they show me before my eyes by deed. Therefore, as they are churches, so are they apostles, evangelists, and prophets; that is, they are the devil's apostles,

1) In the first edition: "Devil's Heron".

Evangelists and prophets. For the right apostles, evangelists and prophets preach God's word, and not against God's word.

265. When the apostles, evangelists, and prophets have ceased, others must have taken their place, and will continue to do so until the end of the world. For the church shall not cease until the end of the world; therefore apostles, evangelists, and prophets must remain, and be called what they will or can, who do the word and work of God. For the pope and his followers of God's word, and yet they themselves confess that it is true, must be very bad apostles, evangelists, and prophets, as the devil is with his angels. But how come I to the shameful, foul people of the pope? let them depart once more, and call them not to come again, or 2c.

026 As it was said above concerning the four other things of the great divine holiness, by which the holy church is sanctified, that thou shalt not consider who they are, nor how they are, from whom they are received; so in this thou shalt not inquire who he is, nor how he is, that giveth it thee, or that hath the ministry. For all things are given, not to him that hath them, but to him that shall have them by his ministry, that he may have them with thee whithersoever he will. Let him be what he will, and how he can; because he is in office, and is tolerated by the multitude, so let it go also; his person makes the word and sacrament of God neither worse nor better for thee. For it is not what he speaks or does, but Christ your Lord, and the Holy Spirit speaks and does all things, so long as he remains to teach and do in the right way; so that the church should not suffer, nor can suffer, public vice. But thou alone be content and let go, because thou single one cannot be the whole multitude, or the Christian holy people.

267 But thou must not turn to the pope, which saith that no husband may be called to such an office, but that all should be chaste virgins, according to the Nestorian consequence, that is, all ministers should be chaste, but they themselves may be unchaste. Behold, still thou comest in to me with thy pabst, and I would have thee no more. Well, then, be ill with me...

268 The pope condemns the life of bishops or parish priests, and that is evident enough. At that he has not enough, condemns still much harder the viAnmiam, and that I say it yes clear, he makes fourfold viZnluos, if not fivefold. I will now call viZnmum two-faced, who twice freies, or takes another's widow. The first bisexual is he that taketh two virgins in succession to wife; the second, he that taketh a widow; the third, he that taketh a bride left a virgin by her dead bridegroom; The fourth, indeed, is disgraceful in that he must also be called a two-woman man, because he takes a virgin unknowingly, unwillingly, and afterwards finds her neither pure nor a virgin; but in short, he must be a two-woman man with the pope, much more than the third, who took the bride a virgin. These all stink and smell badly in spiritual law, and may not preach, baptize, administer the sacrament, or exercise any office of the church, if they were more holy than St. John, and their wives more holy than God's mother. So perfectly holy is the pope in his decrees!

269 But if a man had weakened a hundred virgins, defiled a hundred honest widows, and had a hundred whores lying behind his back, he might not only become a preacher or a priest, but also a bishop or a pope, and if he still did so, he would still be served in such offices; but if he gets a virgin bride, or a false virgin, he cannot be God's servant. It is of no use that he should be a true Christian, learned, pious, and useful; he is a two-faced man; he must leave office, and never come to it. How think'st thou? Is not this a new, higher holiness, neither is Christ himself, both with the Holy Ghost and his church? Christ disdaineth not, neither one-woman, nor two-woman, nor one-woman, nor two-woman, if they believe in him; he suffereth them to remain members of his holy Christian people; ye also need whereunto they are, or may be, useful. Although after of the holy scriptures is called a two-woman, he that hath at one time two living wives, as Lamech; but the pope is more learned, and is called a two-woman, he that hath two wives after one another, so also of wives; for he is much more learned, neither is God himself.

270 And that which is still more excellent, the pope himself also confesseth that the marriage of two women is lawful, and sinneth not against God, nor the world, nor the church, and that the same marriage is a sacrament of the church; neither must he be rejected from the church office; neither the third and fourth, which ought justly to be called initiated or virgin men. Why is this? Because such a marriage cannot be a sacrament or figure of Christ and the church; for Christ has only one bride, the church, and the bride only one husband, Christ, and both remain virgins. In this piece there are so many inconsistent foolish things that no one can tell them all, so that the canonists should be called donkey Christians. First of all, if marriage is to be a sacrament of Christ and the church, then no marriage must be a sacrament, but only that in which the bridegroom and bride both remain virgins; for Christ and the church remain virgins. Where then shall we take children and heirs? Where will the married state, instituted by God, remain? And summa, there will be no marriage, because Joseph and Mary, or the like; all other marriages must be no sacrament, perhaps also fornication.

271 Secondly, who hath taught or ordained these things, that we should keep them? St. Paul, Eph. 5:32, saith that man and wife are one great sacrament; yea, I say in Christ and the church. Dear, canst thou take me from these words of St. Paul, that marriage is a sacrament, as they say of sacraments? He says that man and woman are one body, which is a great sacrament. After this he interprets himself: I say of Christ and the church, and not of man and woman. So they say he speaks of man and woman. Paul wants Christ and the church to be a great sacrament or mystery, so they say that man and woman are a great sacrament. Why then do they consider it the least sacrament, yea, for all uncleanness and sin, wherein it is not possible to worship God?

nen? Further, can you also find in St. Paul's words that the marriage of the two-women and two-men is not man and woman, or One Body? If they are one body, why are they not also the sacrament of Christ and of the church? For St. Paul speaketh commonly of all husbands and wives that become one body, that they are single or widows, and calleth them sacrament (as ye understand sacrament). Whence then are ye so wise as to make a distinction of marriage, and take only that one marriage for the sacrament of Christ and of the church, when a man is united in marriage to a virgin, and exclude all other marriages? Who hath commanded you St. Paul's words thus to torture and compel?

272 Neither do ye keep the same marriage unto the sacrament. For the bridegrooms do not let their brides remain virgins, nor do they take husbands for the sake of remaining virgins, which they can do much better without husbands, but they want to bear children and should do so, as God created them to do. Now where is the sacrament of Christ and of the church, which both remain virgins? But is it fine argttirt a LZuru aā Historiam, vol econtra, ab historia all LZuram? Where did ye learn such dialsetieam? Christ and the Church are conjugal, and remain virgins in the flesh; therefore man and woman shall also remain virgins in the flesh. Item, Christ is only wedded to one virgin; therefore a Christian or priest must also be wedded to one virgin alone, otherwise the sacrament is not there? Why then do ye allow and say that the marriage of widows is also a sacrament, because it can be a marriage, and again, yet not a sacrament, because the woman was not a virgin? Are ye not mad and foolish and gross nestorii, who know not what ye say yea or nay, one in Antsesäsuts, another in Oons6gu6ut6? Out with you coarse asses and fools!

273 This error also came from this (is not the other from this), that they called and held the bishops and popes bridegrooms of the church; therefore they draw the saying of St. Paul [1 Tim. 3:2], "A bishop shall be the husband of one wife," that is, a bishop of one church, as Christ is of one wife.

The church is the bridegroom; therefore they shall not be viZawi. Truly, popes and bishops are fine fellows to be the bridegroom of the church. Yea, if it were the harlot, or the devil's daughter in hell! Right bishops are servants of this bride, and she is the wife and mistress of them. St. Paul calls himself Diaconon, a servant of the church [1 Cor. 3, 5.], does not want to be bridegroom nor lord of this bride, but Jesus Christ Son of God, so the right some is called bridegroom of this bride. St. John saith not, I am the bridegroom, but, I am the bridegroom's friend, and rejoice that I should hear his speech. For "he that hath the bride (saith he [John 3:29]) is the bridegroom," whose language one ought to hear with joy, and to think himself a servant after it.

274 But how fine they themselves hold this very gross folly and foolishness! A bishop may have three bishoprics, but he must be called a woman's husband. And even if he has only one bishopric, he may have a hundred, two hundred, five hundred, or more parishes or churches; nor is he the bridegroom of one church. The pope wants to be the bridegroom of all churches, large and small, nor is he called the husband of one church. These are not four or two women, who have so many brides at once. But he that taketh a virgin that hath been trusted is a viZuwus. Such unfeigned, monstrous foolishness shall God inflict upon us, if we despise his word, and will do all things better than he hath commanded us.

(275) Yea, they have an Acutius in their decree, 1) because St. Augustine holds against St. Jerome, that he who before baptism had a wife, after baptism also had one, was a two-woman. Dear asses, does it also follow from this that St. Augustine, although he considers this man to be a two-woman (which Scripture does not), wants to condemn him so that he may not serve God, as you do? And if it follow from this, have ye not a strong noli meis against it in D. 9? 2) How that ye hold the Acutius so firmly (which is contrary to the Scriptures)?

1) Decret. P. 1, Vist. 26, 6. 2. (Erl. Ausg.)

2) Decret. ? 1, Vist. 9, 6. 3. (Erl. Ausg.)

and the I'oli Eis, together with other chapters, is thus passed over? Yes, this is the opinion, you want to be lords of the churches; what you say should be right: marriage should be right and a sacrament, if you want; again, marriage should be impurity, that is, a shitty sacrament that cannot serve God, if you want; marriage should bear children, but the woman should remain a virgin, or is not a sacrament of Christ and the church, if you want. The two-women are without fault, and have a right marriage and sacrament, if ye will; again, they are condemned from the service of God, because they have no sacrament of Christ and the church, if ye will. Behold, how the devil doth shudder and tremble, that teacheth you such an unreasonable thing!

(276) How could I think that St. Augustine's saying was an article of faith, when he himself did not think that his sayings were articles of faith, nor that his ancestors' sayings were articles of faith? If the dear fathers have so held and taught that viAamus means such a one (as has been said), what is that to us? We need not therefore so hold nor teach. We need not stake our salvation on man's word or work, as on hay and straw our house. But the canonists are such gross asses and fools with their idol at Rome, that they make vain articles of faith out of the "dear" fathers' sayings and doings, against their will and without their thanks. Let it be proved from the Scriptures that such men are called two-women and three-women, so that it would be right that they should not be ministers of the church, according to the teaching of St. Paul, 1 Tim. 3:2: "A bishop shall be the husband of one wife." But it hath often happened unto the fathers, that they have sewed an old rag upon a new cloth. So here it is right, and the new cloth, that no viZamus should be a minister; but that this or that one should be an OiZamus, that is an old lump of their conceit, because the Scripture saith it not. But in the Scripture he that hath two living wives is called a two-woman; and St. Paul is reckoned to have had a wife, Phil. 4:3, and to have died to her. Accordingly he must also be a two-woman, and leave the apostleship; for 1 Cor. 7, 8. he reckons

And yet he will have power with Barnaba, 1 Cor. 9:5, 6, to have another wife with him. Who will make us sure that the poor fishermen Peter, Andrew, and James were virgins and not widows, or that they had not two wives in succession?

The asses' heads do not mean chastity, as the fathers did, but would gladly mislead the poor souls, and cast them into the road, only that their nasty stink-book might be right, and that their art might not err, nor have erred. Else they see what chastity is thought to be. Can they not, after all, in their own opinionibus (and what is it, for vain opinionos are their best and most) finely say, Xou tsuotur; Ho6 touo; why cannot they do it here also? for otherwise they reject not one, but all the fathers at once in one heap in eausis ckocüäonäis, as their idol spouts and roars. But they would gladly govern the churches, not with certain wisdom, but with wanton opinionibus, and again make all the souls of the world to err and be uncertain, as they did before. But as they reject the fathers and theologians out of their canons, so we again reject them out of the church and out of the Scriptures. They ought not to teach us the Scriptures, nor to rule in the church; it behooves them not, neither can they; but they ought to wait upon their canonicals and contentions of prebends, which is their holiness. They have rejected us poor theologians together with the fathers from their books, for which we thank them kindly. Now they want to throw us out of the church and the Scriptures, and they are not fit for it themselves. This is too much, and it tears the sack; neither will we suffer it.

0278 I hold, indeed, that according to their wisdom no man ought to take a virgin, or after her death not to become a priest with them. For who can become his guarantor, or be good for him, that he may surely take a virgin? The way passeth over at the door, as they say. And if he find her not a virgin when he dare, he is a stinking two-woman man without fault. And if he be sure that he may become a priest, he must not take a virgin: for who shall make him sure?

But to ravish virgins, widows, and wives, to have many harlots, and to commit all manner of dumb sins, he may well do; then is he worthy to be a priest. But this is the sum of it: the pope, the devil, and his church are opposed to the married state, as Daniel says in chapter 11:37; therefore he will defile it so that he will not be able to hold the priesthood. This much must be said: Marriage is whoredom, sin, uncleanness, rejected of God. And if they say that it is holy and a sacrament, they lie out of a false heart. For if they held it holy and a sacrament with earnestness, they would not forbid the priests to marry. But because they forbid, they must hold it to be unclean and sinful, as they also plainly say, Nunäsmīni, good l'ortis; or must (where some are so pious) be gross Nestorii and Eutyches, who set Antecedens, and deny the Consequens. So be it this time donkey pabst, and pabst donkey with his donkey lawyers received, will come again to ours.

279 Turn not, therefore, as I have said, to the papists, who and how he is that leadeth the church office. For the asses understand not St. Paul's word, neither know they what St. Paul's orammstioa is called a sacrament. Sacrament, saith he, [Eph. 5:32], is Christ and his church, that is, Christ and the church are one body, as man and woman; but it is great mystery, and must be comprehended by faith, it cannot be seen nor grasped; therefore it is a sacrament, that is, a secret thing, mysterium, invisible, hidden. But because not only virgin spouses, but also widow spouses, are one body, every marriage is a figure or sign of this great sacrament or mystery in Christ and the church. St. Paul does not speak either of virgins or widows; he speaks of marriage, since man and woman are One Body. Wherefore when thou seest such offices or ministers, know that certainly the holy Christian people must be; for the church cannot be without such bishops, pastors, preachers, priests; and again, neither can they be without the church, they must be with one another.

(280) Sixth, the holy Christian people are outwardly recognized by their prayers, praising and thanking God publicly. For where you see and When you hear people praying and learning to pray the Lord's Prayer, and singing psalms or spiritual songs according to the word of God and the right faith, or publicly practicing the faith, the Ten Commandments, and the Catechism, then know that there is a holy Christian people of God. For prayer is also one of the holy things, by which all things become holy, as St. Paul says [1 Tim. 4:5]. So the Psalms are also prayer, in which one praises, thanks, and honors God. And faith and the ten commandments are also the word of God, and all things are holy things, by which the Holy Spirit sanctifies the holy people of Christ. But we speak of prayer and chant, which is intelligible, from which one can learn and improve. For the hearing of monks, nuns, and priests is not prayer, nor praise to God. For they do not understand it, and learn nothing from it, so they do it like the work of a donkey, for the sake of their belly, and no improvement, nor sanctification, nor God's will is sought in it.

281 In the seventh place, the holy Christian people are known outwardly by the sanctuary of the holy cross, that they must suffer all misfortunes and persecutions, all kinds of temptations and evils (as the Lord's Prayer prays) from the devil, the world, and the flesh, mourning inwardly, being stupid, being afraid, being poor outwardly, despised, sick, weak, in order that they may become like their Head, Christ. And the cause must also be this alone, that he hold fast to Christ and God's word, and so suffer for Christ's sake, Matt. 5:11: "Blessed are they which suffer persecution for my sake." They must be pious, quiet, obedient, ready to serve the authorities and everyone with body and goods, and do no harm to anyone. But no people on earth must suffer such bitter hatred; they must be worse than Jews, Gentiles, Turks, Summa, they must be called heretics, brutes, devils, accursed, and the most wicked people on earth, that even those do a service to God by whom they are hanged, drowned, murdered, martyred, chased away, tormented, and that no one has mercy on them, but also waters them with myrrh and gall where they thirst; Not because they are adulterers, murderers, thieves, or scoundrels, but because they desire Christ alone, and no other God. Wherefore when thou seest or hearest these things, know this,

2290 Erl. (2.) 25, 435-437. cap. 15. negotiations on account of a concilii. W. XVI, 2804-2807. 2291

That the holy Christian church is, as he saith Matt. 5:11, 12: "Blessed are ye, when men curse you, and cast your name into contempt, as an evil thing, and that for my sake: be ye glad and rejoice: for great is your reward in heaven." For with this sanctuary the Holy Spirit makes this people not only holy, but also blessed.

0282 And in the mean time turn not aside unto the sanctuary of the papists from dead saints, from the wood of the holy cross. For there are as many bones of the pale as legs of saints, and as many of the wood of the gallows as of the holy cross. And there is all deceit among them, that the priest may deceive the people for money, and deceive them from Christ. Even if it were holy, no one would make it holy. But if they condemn, curse, rebuke, blaspheme, and afflict you for Christ's sake, that makes you holy. For it kills the old Adam to learn patience, humility, gentleness, praise and thanksgiving, and to rejoice in suffering. This is called being sanctified by the Holy Spirit and renewed to a new life in Christ, and thus learning to believe, trust, hope, and love God, as Rom. 5:4, Tribulatio spem, etc., says. Now these are the right seven main parts of the high sanctification, by which the Holy Spirit exercises in us a daily sanctification and vivification in Christ. And this according to the first table of Moses, which we fulfill thereby, though not so abundantly as Christ did; but we always follow after, under his redemption, or forgiveness of sins, until we also once become wholly holy, and need no more forgiveness; for to that end it is all directed. I would have called them the seven sacraments; but because this word "sacrament" has been misused by the papists, and is used differently in Scripture, I leave them seven principal parts of Christian sanctification, or seven sanctuaries.

283 Now above these seven principal things there are also more outward signs, whereby the holy Christian church is known, namely, that the Holy Ghost sanctifieth us also according to the outer table of Moses, when he helpeth us to honour our father and mother heartily, and again to bring up children in a Christian manner, and to live honestly; when we obey our lords and rulers faithfully, and are faithful to them.

They, in turn, love, protect, and shield their subjects. Item, if we are not unkind to anyone, bear no anger, hatred, envy or revenge against our neighbor, but gladly forgive, gladly lend, help and advise; if we are not lewd and drunkards, proud, hopeful, splendid, but chaste, chaste, sober, kind, gentle and humble; not stealing, robbing, profiteering, stinging, overdoing, but mild, kind, gracious, compassionate; not false, lying, perjuring, but truthful, constant, and what more of such commandments are taught, as all these St. Paul teacheth abundantly now and then. For therefore we also must have the vealoZ, not only that he may tell us lawfully what we ought to do, but also that we may see inwardly how far the Holy Ghost hath brought us with his Holy One, and how far we still lack, lest we should be sure and think that we have now done all. And so always growing in sanctification, and becoming more and more a new creature in Christ; it is called or68oit6, and aVunäetw maZis [1 Thess. 4:1, 10].

284. But though such signs may not be regarded as certain as those above, because some heathen also practice such works, and sometimes seem more holy than Christians, yet their thing is not so pure and simple in the heart, for God's sake, but seeks something else in it, because they have neither right faith nor knowledge of God, but here is the Holy Spirit, who sanctifies the heart, and brings forth such fruit in the good, refined heart, as Christ says in the parable Matt. 13:23. 13:23. And because the first table is higher, and there must be more sanctuary, I have tried to sum it all up in the other table; otherwise I might well have divided it into seven sanctuaries, or principal parts, according to the seven commandments.

(285) Now we have certain what, where, and who it is, the holy Christian church, that is, the holy Christian people of God, and we cannot lack it, of that we are well assured. Everything else besides these things may be lacking, and certainly is lacking, as we shall hear in part. From such a people one should take people to the concilium; that would be a concilium, that would be governed by the Holy Spirit. So Lyra also writes that the church is not to be reckoned according to the high or spiritual classes, but according to the people who believe. I am surprised that he was not burned for this word, that he does not want to let popes, cardinals, bishops, and prelates be the church, which results in horrible heresies that are offensive to the holy Roman church and much too close to it. Elsewhere.

286 Therefore, when the devil saw that God was building such a holy church, he did not celebrate, and<sup>1</sup> built his chapel with it, which is larger than God's church, and did thus: He saw that God was taking external things, as baptism, word, sacrament, keys, etc., and thereby sanctifying his church (as he is always God's monkey, and wants to do all things according to God, and make them better), By sanctifying his church (as he is always God's monkey, and wants to do all things according to God, and to make things better), he also took external things before him, which should also sanctify; just as he does with the weather-makers, sorcerers, and devils' spells 2c., so he also has the Lord's Prayer and the Gospel read over it, so that it may be a great sanctuary. So he has had the popes and papists consecrate or sanctify water, salt, candles, herbs, bells, images, znus oei, kallia, altar, casels, plates, fingers, hands; who will tell it all? lastly, the monk's caps so sanctified that many people have died and been buried in them, as if they wanted to be saved by it. Now that would be fine, if God's word, blessing, or prayer were spoken over the creature, as children do over tables, and over themselves when they go to sleep and get up, of which St. Paul says [1 Tim. 4:5], "All creatures are good, and are sanctified by word and prayer." For from this the creature gets no new power, but is confirmed in its former power.

287 But the devil seeketh another, but would that by his monkey play the creature should have new power and authority. Just as water, through God's word, becomes a baptism, a bath to eternal life, washes away sin and makes us blessed, which is not the nature or power of water; and bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ; sins are forgiven by the laying on of hands, according to God's appointment: so the devil also wants his conjuring and monkey play to be powerful, and to be overpowering.

do something to nature. Holy water is said to eradicate sin, it is said to cast out devils, it is said to ward off poltergeists, it is said to protect child-babies, as the pope teaches us. Aquam sale, äs ps.; so shall holy salt also do; Agnus Dei, consecrated by the pope, shall do more than God himself is able to do, as such is described in verses which I should omit once glossiret. Bells shall chase away the devils in the weather; Antony's knives stab the devil; the blessed herbs drive away the poisonous worms; some blessings heal the cows, ward off the milk thieves, extinguish fires; some letters make safe in war and also otherwise, against iron, fire, water, animals 2c.; monasticism, mass and the like shall give more than common blessedness. And who can tell it all? No need has been so small, the devil has founded a sacrament or sanctuary on it, through which one finds counsel and help. He has also had prophetesses, soothsayers, and wise men who can reveal secret things and bring back stolen goods.

O, he is far, far above God, equipped with sacraments, prophets, apostles, evangelists, and his chapels far greater than God's church, has also far a greater people in his holiness than God. He is also more easily and more willingly believed in His promise, in His sacraments, in His prophets, and in Christ. He is the great God in the world, as Christ calls Him [John 12:31, 14:30, 16:11], "Prince of the world," and Paul 2 Cor. 4:4, "God of this world." With such monkey play he draws people away from the faith of Christ, and makes the Word and Sacraments of Christ despised, and in addition almost unrecognizable, because one can produce all things nearer than, to blot out sin, to help out of troubles, to be saved by the Sacrament of the devil, neither by the Sacrament of Christ. For by his Holy Spirit he wants to make people holy and devout in body and soul, and not let them remain in unbelief and sin. This is too difficult for those who do not like to be pious or to refrain from sinning, but they can easily get hold of this work of the Holy Spirit after they have learned how to

Without the work of the Holy Spirit it is easier to be saved than by holy water, by Agnus Dei, by bulls and letters, by masses and monk's caps; therefore it is not necessary to look for or respect anything else.

289 Not only this, but the devil prepared himself in this way, so that he would even abolish the Word and Sacrament of God, and thought thus: If anyone should appear who would attack my church, Sacrament, and bishops, as if outward things did not make them blessed, then God's Word and Sacrament shall also perish with them. For they are also outward signs, and his bishops and church are also bodily men. If mine is not valid, his must be much less valid, because my church, bishops, and sacraments work and help in this life and in the present, so that it must be seen and grasped. For I am there, and soon help as one desires. But Christ's sacraments work on the future and invisible being, in the spirit, so that one can hardly smell his churches and bishops a little from afar, and the Holy Spirit pretends that he is not there, so that they suffer all misfortune and must be held as heretics before my church. However, my church is not only so close that it can easily be grasped, but my works also soon follow, so that everyone thinks that it is the right church of God. Such is the advantage I have and can enjoy.

290. So also, when we began to teach by the gospel that such outward things could not save, because they were evil creatures in the flesh, and were often used of the devil for sorcery, men, even great and learned men, fell away, that baptism, being an outward water, the word, being an outward human speech, the scripture, being an outward letter made by dints, the bread and wine, being baked by the baker, should be evil, because they were outward corruptible things. So they cried out, Spirit, Spirit, the spirit must do it, the letter killeth. So Muenzer called us Wittenberg theologians the scribes, and to the spiritual scholars he gave himself up.

1) Here we have adopted the conjecture of the Jena edition: "mine" instead of: "my".

And after him many more. Therein thou seest how the devil had thus armed himself, and had made himself known: if his outward doctrine and sacraments (which yet soon and visibly and mightily help) were attacked, the outward sacraments and words of Christ (which come slowly with help, or ever invisibly and weakly) must perish much more with them.

291 Therefore Loolosia, the holy Christian people, hath not evil outwardly word, sacraments, or offices, as the monkey of God, Satan, hath also, and much more, but hath commanded, ordained, and ordered them of God, so that he himself (not an angel) will work thereby with the Holy Ghost. And it is not angels, nor men, nor creatures, but God's own word, baptism, sacrament, or forgiveness, that is called ministry; without which he will do it, for the comfort and good of us poor, weak, stupid people, not by his mere, appearing, bright majesty. For who could suffer the same for a moment in such sinful poor flesh? As Moses saith [2 Mos. 33:20.]: Nou viãodit wo iioiũo ot vivot. So the Jews could not suffer his feet's shoe on Mount Sinai, Ex. 20:18. f., That is, in the weather and the clouds, how could they have suffered the sun of his divine majesty and the clear face with such dull eyes? but he will do it by means that are pleasant, clean, and sweet, which could not be better known by ourselves, than that a good, kind man should speak to us, preach, lay hands on us, forgive sins, baptize us, give us bread and wine to eat and drink. Who can be astonished at such sweet forms, and not rather rejoice with all his heart?

Well, this is good for us stupid people, in which we see how God deals with us as with dear children, and does not want (as he would have the right to do) to act majestically with us, and yet under this he exercises his majestic, divine works, power and authority, as forgiving sin, sweeping away sin, taking away death, giving grace and eternal life. Yes, such a thing is missing in the devil's sacraments and churches, so that no one can say that God commanded, commanded, instituted, instituted, that He Himself wants to be there and do everything Himself, but one must say: God did not command it.

293. Summa, if God were to give you a straw to pick up, or a feather to pluck up, with such a command, order, and promise, that by it you should have forgiveness of all sin, His grace, and eternal life, should you not accept, love, and praise it with all joy and gratitude, and therefore hold that same straw and feather more sacred, and let it be dearer to you than heaven and earth? For however small the straw or feather, yet by it thou getest such good as neither heaven nor earth, nor even all angels, can give thee. Why then are we such shameful people that we do not hold the baptismal water, bread, and wine, that is, Christ's body and blood, oral word, and the laying on of a man's hands for forgiveness, as highly sacred as we would hold the straw or feather, even though in them, as we hear and know, God Himself wants to work, and His water, word, hand, bread, and wine are to be, through which He wants to sanctify you and make you blessed in Christ, who has purchased such things for us and given the Holy Spirit from the Father for such a work?

1) Preachers = Dominicans.

Priesthoods. If thou couldst bear heaven and earth, that thou mightest be saved, yet all is lost: and he that lifteth up the straw, where it is needful, doeth more than thou, if thou couldst bear ten worlds. Why is that? God wants us to obey his word, to use his sacraments, to honor his church, so he wants to make it gracious and gentle enough, and more gracious, even fifth, than we could desire. For it is said [Ex. 20:2, 3], "I am thy God, thou shalt have no other gods"; it is also said, "This is the one ye shall hear" [Matt. 17:5], and no other. Let this be enough said of the church. There is nothing more to be said of it, except that every part of it may be further elided. The other things must have a different opinion, of which we will also say.

"Let all things be done in good order. And let no man (as no Christian does) despise such order without a cause, out of pride to make a disorder of all things; but let him keep such order for the good of the multitude, or else let him neither err nor hinder it. For that would be contrary to love and kindness.

(296) Nevertheless they shall remain free, as, if we cannot, from necessity, or other useful causes, preach at 6 or 7, at 12 or 1, on Sunday or Monday, in the choir or at St. Peter's, preach at other hours and days and places; only that we do not mislead the household, but carry them along in such change. For such things are altogether outward, and subject to reason (as the time, place, and person require) mightily and wholly; God, Christ, and the Holy Spirit ask nothing of them, any more than what and where we will eat, drink, clothe ourselves, dwell, be at liberty, walk, or stand; without which (as I have said) without cause no man shall undertake any thing of his own, and mislead or hinder the company. Just as at weddings or other parties, no one should do anything special or obstructive to the bride or the party, but should sit, walk, stand, dance, eat, and drink with the party. For one cannot order a table, a kitchen, a cellar, or a servant for every man. If he lacks anything, let him get up from the table and let the others sit and stay in peace. So here, too, everything should be done peacefully and orderly, and yet be free to change where time, person, or other causes demand it; there, the crowd also follows one another, because (as I said) it makes no Christian more holy or more unholy.

297 Although the pope has clicked the world full of books about it, and has made of it a vile rope, law, justice, articles of faith, sin, and holiness, that it would be well worth burning his decree with fire. For such a book might well have been guessed at, which has done great harm. It has pushed the Holy Scriptures under the bench, and has almost suppressed Christian doctrine, and has also brought the jurists with their imperial law under itself, thus destroying both the church and the church.

For this they have given us the coarse asses' heads, the canonists, the false wives, who thereby govern the church, and, what is still more deplorable, have left the best in it, and taken out the worst, and driven it into the church by force. For what is good in it could be found much better and more abundantly in the Holy Scriptures, even in St. Augustine, as far as teaching Christianity is concerned, and also in the books of the lawyers, as far as secular government is concerned. For the jurists themselves have intended to throw such a book out of jurisprudence and leave it to the theologians. But it would be better if it were thrown into the fire and reduced to ashes, even though there is something good in it. For how can there be vain evil where there is no good? But the evil is too much that it takes the place of the good, and (as I said) the good is to be found more abundantly in Scripture, also in the fathers and in the jurists; one wants to keep it, then, as a testimony on the libraire, so that one may see how the popes and some concilia, along with other teachers, have cheated and erred; therefore I also keep it.

298 Let us look upon such outward articles as a vest's garment, or a diaper, wherein a child is baptized. For a child is not baptized or sanctified by a vesture garment or diapers, but only by baptism; yet it is reasonable to put it in a cloth. If this becomes unclean or torn, another is taken, and the child grows without all the help of nappies or napkins; but that in this case measures are kept, and the nappies or napkins are not taken too much, so that the child is not suffocated. So the ceremonies should also have a measure, so that they do not become a burden or work in the end, but remain so light that they are not felt. Just as no one feels a burden or work at a wedding, if he keeps himself the same as the others and offers himself. Of the special fast I will write once, when I shall write of the German plague, eating and drinking. For it also almost belongs to the secular regiment.

299 Of the schools also have I written above, and much else, that one should be firm and diligently about it. For although they are to be regarded as a pagan, external thing, in that boys learn languages and arts, they are highly necessary. For where Schiller is not taught, we shall not long have pastors and preachers, as we have well learned; for the school must give the church persons who can be made apostles, evangelists, prophets, that is, preachers, pastors, rulers. No matter what other people there are in the whole world who are to be chancellors, councillors, scribes, and the like, who also help to govern in the world. Above this, where the schoolmaster fears God, and teaches the boys to understand, sing, and practice the Word of God and the right faith, and keeps them in Christian discipline, the schools are (as said above) vain young, eternal concilia, which create more benefit than many other great concilia. For this reason, previous emperors, kings, and princes did well to build so many schools, high and small, monasteries and convents, with such diligence that they wanted to create a rich, large supply of people for the church, but their descendants shamefully turned them to abuse. So princes and lords should also do now, turn the monasteries' goods to the school, and endow many people for the studio; if our descendants abuse it, then we have done our part in our time.

300] In sum, the school must be next to the church, as in it young preachers and priests are begotten, and from it they are subsequently placed in the place of death. After that, the citizen's house is next to the school, as from it one must get pupils; after that, the town hall and castle, which citizens must protect, so that they beget children to the school, and schools send out children to the parish, and after that, parish priests can in turn make churches and God's children (be it citizen, prince, or emperor). God, however, must be the supreme and neighbor, who keeps such a ring or circle against the devil, and does everything in all classes, even in all creatures. So Ps. 127:1, 2. says that on earth alone there are two bodily regiments, the city and the house: "Where the LORD buildeth not the house"; item: "Where the LORD keepeth not the city." The first is, housekeeping, out of which come people.

The other is to rule the city, that is, the land, the people, the princes, and the lords (which we call the worldly authority). That is, to give everything, child, goods, money, animals 2c. The house must build, the city must guard, protect, and defend. Then comes the third, God's own house and city, that is, the church, which must have people from the house and protection and protection from the city.

These are the three hierarchies ordained of God, and we are not allowed to do any more, but we have enough and more than enough to do, that we may live rightly in these three, against the devil. For behold the house alone, what is to be done there, to be obedient to parents and masters of the house; in turn, to divinely feed, raise, govern, and provide for children and servants; that we would have enough to do with the right of the house, if there were nothing else to do. After that, the city, that is, the secular government, also gives us enough to do, where we are faithfully obedient; again, our subjects, land and people are to judge, protect and promote. The devil gives us enough to do, and God has given us sweat of the nose, thistle and thorns in abundance, so that we have plenty of these two rights to learn, to live, to do and to suffer. After this is the third right and rule; where the Holy Spirit rules, it is called a comforting, sweet, light burden [Matt. 11:30]; where it does not, it is not only heavy, sour, and terrible, but also impossible, as Paul says Rom. 8:3: Impossibile legis; and elsewhere: "The letter killeth" [2 Cor. 3:6].

(302) What then shall we do about these three high divine regiments, about the three, divine, natural, temporal rights, the blasphemous jugglery or regiment of the pope? Which wants to be everything, and yet is nothing, but seduces and tears us from these blessed divine estates and rights, and puts on us a larva or cap for it, and makes us fools and jesters to the devil, who walk idly and no longer know these three divine hierarchies or rights. Therefore let us suffer it no more, but do according to St. Peter's, Paul's, Augustine's doctrine, and be free from it, and turn the 2nd Psalm, v. 3, against them: "Let us break their bonds, and from cast us their ropes." Yea, let us sing with St. Paul [Gal. 1:8], "Whosoever teacheth otherwise, though it were an angel from heaven, let him be accursed"; and say with St. Petro [Acts 15:16], "Why tempt ye God with laying on such burdens?" And so again be lords of the Pabst, and tread him under foot, as Ps. 91:13. saith, "Thou shalt walk upon the adder and basilisk, and the lion and trample dragons under foot." And this we will do by the power and help of the seed of the woman, which hath bruised the serpent's head, [Gen. 3:15] and bruise it still, though we dare it to bite us in the heels again. Unto the same forsaken seed of the woman be praise and glory, together with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one true God and Lord for ever and ever, Amen.

To the excellent and sincere servant of Christ, Mr. Jakob Probst, Licentiate of Theology, Servant of the Word in Bremen, his exceedingly dear brother.

Grace and peace in the Lord! Thou hast known, my dear Jacob, that I was absent, when your John Zelst <sup>1)</sup> came, and

1) Zelst was the Caplan Probsts at Unser Lieben Frauen Kirche in Bremen.

I am truly sorry. But since then I have also had to work in God's cause, since the burden of the entire empire lies on us. Today, the first day of June, the Emperor is still at Innsbruck and will perhaps go to Augsburg around Pentecost. 2) There is great hope that the Emperor will act mercifully, and he has indeed written to our Prince two or three times in a merciful manner, as have others of his Court, especially the Count of Nassau, Heinrich. Then he gave this sign of his mercy: since the dukes of Bavaria, Duke George and Margrave Joachim, passed Augsburg and hurried to Innsbruck to the emperor, so that they might seize the emperor, 3) and, by forestalling him, incite him against our prince, the emperor did not want to admit them, 4) since he also wanted to remain impartial in the matter against the others. And the highest chancellor, Mercurinus, has publicly said that he does not want to participate in violent attacks,

2) The news in this letter find mostly from Melanchthon's letter to Luther of May 26, No. 927 in this volume.

3) Compare St. Louis edition, vol. IV, 1444, tz 27.

4) In this Melanchthon, therefore also Luther, was not rightly reported. In fact, a kind of "Vorreichstag" was held in Innsbruck.

because he had seen enough at Worms what violent attacks could achieve. He desires that the affairs of the church be ordered peacefully. Perhaps God has awakened this Naaman [2 Kings 5] for us there. Let us only pray; our prayer has begun to be heard, let us not desist. There is a great riot in Augsburg, so that our prince spends 100 florins on bread alone every week and consumes 2000 florins weekly. This Diet will not be able to last long. Eck has poured out forty theses, which are full of the devil, against us, and offers himself for disputation against all, except against himself, and even most of all against himself. We laugh at this man's rage; there will be no opportunity to dispute now that the enemy has killed so many, nor will there be time at Augsburg.

I am staying within the borders of Saxon territory, right between Wittenberg and Augsburg. For it was not safe to take me to Augsburg. There you have almost the whole thing as it stands at present to Augsburg. Philip, Jonas, Spalatin, and Agricola are with the prince at Augsburg.

2) I write, as you desire, a letter of consolation to the Count in Friesland. 2) Further, I have delivered to the Prince the lies of Carlstadt, which you sent before, and I believe that the Prince has sent to the Count a letter of consolation.

1) The 41 theses are meant here, to which Eck gave the superscription: Artieuli Imtigli, which Melanchthon wrote in No. 904 of this volume. not the 404 theses, which Melanchthon mentions in Nö. 902.

2) Count Enno II. , successor of Count Edzard, who died on February 14, 1528. Under him Melchior Hofmaun and Carlstadt, also Zwinglians, came into the country and made great progress there, while the count adhered to Luther. Therefore he sent an embassy to Bugenhagen, who was then in Hamburg, asking him to come there for a short time and, by preaching the Gospel, to ward off the false teachers and the Anabaptists. Bugenhagen refused. On the other hand, in July 1529, the two Bremen clergymen Johann Timann and Joh. Pelt came, who worked there for a while and, before returning home, presented the count with a number of articles, from which a religious edict was drafted, which the count presented to all preachers called to Emden on January 13, 1530, for acceptance. The Zwinglian-minded remonstrated, but after Luther's expert opinion had been obtained, the count had it printed as church order and introduced it. (Erl. Briefw.)

I have written to you. I have also just informed you of the same thing by letter, I know that for certain; I am surprised if you have not received the letter.

(3) Furthermore, that the Sacramentans boast that I was defeated at Marburg, they do so in their own way. For they are not only liars, but liars themselves, pretending and pretending nothing, as Carlstadt and Zwingli testify by their deeds and words. But you see that at Marburg, in the articles they have presented, they have recanted the pernicious doctrine they have put forth concerning baptism, the use of the sacraments, likewise concerning the outward word, and other things in the books they have hitherto published. We have not recanted anything. But being also overcome in the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, they would not recant this article, though they saw that they did not pass. For they feared their people, to whom they should not have returned if they had recanted. And how should they not have been defeated, since Zwingli's one and whole argument has been: a body cannot be without place and confined space. I countered him from philosophy: even heaven, so great a body, was naturally without place, and this they could not refute. But Oecolampad's one argument was this: The fathers call it a sign, therefore there is no body. But they promised with many words, that they would so far hold the same discourse with us: Christ's body is truly present in the Lord's Supper (but in a spiritual way), only so that we might condescend to call them brethren, and thus pretend to unity. This is what Zwingli publicly asked in tears in the presence of the landgrave and all, saying these words: "There are no people on earth with whom I would rather be one than with the Wittenbergers. "With the utmost diligence and effort they sought to be considered as one with us, so that they could never suffer this word from me: You have a different spirit from ours. They were completely inflamed, as often as they heard this heard. Finally, as it is written in the last article, we have admitted this, that though they were not brethren, yet they should not be deprived of our love (which is due even to an enemy). Thus it grieved them that they could not obtain the name of a brother, but had to go away as heretics, so that in the meantime we kept peace with one another in writings, whether God might want to open their hearts.

004 These things thou mayest safely say, as I am Christ's preacher, even as Christ is the truth. This also I write as the truth, that thou mayest have something to oppose the lies, when they will not rest. For they have behaved with unbelievable humility and kindness towards us, but, as is now evident, all in a fictitious way, so that they might move us to a feigned harmony and make us participants in and patrons of their error. O what a cunning devil, but a much wiser Christ, who has preserved us! I have already ceased to wonder when they lie impudently. I see that they cannot do otherwise, and I boast because of this case, seeing that, since Satan rules them, they no longer make a show of themselves with hidden attacks (insläus), but with lies publicly. Farewell. Of the articles which Johann Zelst should have told me, especially those which the ungodly people in Marienhafen 1) have placed, I hold that they can be violently overthrown by you. But since I see that this place wants to be visited too much, I have decided, after the example of your Stromer, 2) to wander elsewhere for a while, either ostensibly or seriously, so that the rumor may arise that I am no longer staying here. Therefore you too may henceforth say and write like this with your own, so that they no longer seek me here. This I now indicate to thee with a Jonah-like haste. 3) For I will be hidden, and henceforth ye also keep me likewise hidden in your words and letters.

(2) Here they begin to persuade us that nothing will come of your Diet, and that the Emperor will be delayed by the cunning and artifices of the bishops, until, after all is consumed, you are forced to return home. For it is not expected that the one of Trier and the Count Palatine 4) will be present, and the Emperor, being able to do so by the artifice of the popes, seeks causes of delay in not coming to Augsburg. These things and words make me wonder. But the messenger hurries. Farewell in Christ. June 2, 1530.

To his exceedingly dear brother, Magister Philip, the faithful and wise servant and disciple of Christ.

Grace and peace in the Lord Jesus! At last we have arrived at our Sinai, dearest Philip, but only we will make a Zion of this Sinai, and build there three tabernacles: one for the Psalter, one for the prophets, and one for Aesopus. But this is temporal. <sup>1)</sup> The place is exceedingly pleasant and very suitable for study, except that your absence makes it sad. I begin to be inflamed from the bottom of my heart against the Turk and Mahomet, seeing the unbearable raging of Satan, who rages so hopefully against bodies and souls. Therefore I will pray and plead and not cease until I know that my cry is heard in heaven. Thou art more afflicted with the native monsters of our realm. But it is we who are destined to see and suffer these two last woes, which rage at the same time and break in with the utmost impetuosity. But this very impetuosity is a witness and prophet of his end and of our redemption.

002 I pray Christ, that he would give thee a continued good sleep, and deliver thy heart from trouble, that is, from the fiery darts of Satan, and keep thee from them, amen. This I write, being idle, as I have not yet received my box of papers and things; for I have not yet seen either of the two officers. There is nothing lacking that belongs to the solitude, namely, the very large house that juts out at the castle is entirely ours, and the keys to all the chambers have been given to us. It is said that more than thirty people are kept here, among whom are twelve night watchmen, and two trumpeted (ärometrü) excursionists on different towers. But what is this? Of course I have nothing else to write. In the evening, as I hope, the Kastner will be fine, then perhaps we will hear something new. God's mercy be with you, amen.

Grace and peace in Christ! The fifth cry of the children has sanctified the house of Jonah; now such a temple, and so holy, must not be destroyed in any way, lest Jonah alone by crying should slay the destroyers. I send all the letters which I have received from Wittenberg, that ye may know nothing less than we do. As the messenger hastened, I have answered briefly; at another time, when I have leisure, I will write to them more expansively. As to Cruciger, I have given my wife charge. I charge you that you command this messenger of Jonas <sup>4)</sup> to receive letters home from us again. See what they do at Strasbourg. But Carlstadt will make my prophecy come true, since I have said that he does not believe that there is a God; but they may go and do what they will.

There is nothing new here, except that we are surprised that no letters have come from you yet. I sent letters to you the first day we parted, though I did not know what to write. But now, being prevented by the haste of the messenger, and overwhelmed with a multitude of letters, I have not received several [letters].

2) These "Landsknechte" are not to be referred (with Köstlin, Mart. Luth. [3], vol. II, p. 201) to the soldiers of the castle guard who disturbed him by making noise, but (with Kolde, Mart. Luth., vol. II, p. 330) to the impetuous attacking thoughts.

3) Äl66ioian6N8ibu8 - Non6Uulan6N8ibu8, a play on words which can be rendered in German approximately by: Walen - Dahlen. - "Dahlen" also occurs elsewhere in Luther for jackdaws.

4) Only the Erlangen correspondence, according to the manuscript, has the date: "May 28," all other editions May 8. The above date is made very probable by the fact that Luther states in this letter that he has almost completed the Jeremiah, while he mentions nothing of it in the letter to Melanchthon of May 12 (in the next number).

whether I accuse you of either recklessness or sacrilege because of the tragedy of that Moab 5) since you yourself confess that, apart from the letter in which I asked you for Johann Ernst, 6) you also received four living and speaking letters 7). But I do not want to hold back on this reason of proof, you see, moreover, how much opportunity you show me here yourself to hurl everything back at you in an exceedingly abundant and powerful manner, and you may also, even if you wrote many comments to me, never have answered these four letters of mine sufficiently.

(2) I am indeed idle here, and live gloriously, and have resolved to translate what is left of the prophets into the German language, and have already nearly finished Jeremiah. Perhaps I shall also scatter some little psalms among the people, with the addition of my chips of thought (eoZit'itiuneulis), that I may not sit here in vain, and I shall further write to you more often, if only messengers can be had. I have also set myself the task of adapting Aesop's fables 8) for the childish and coarse people, so that they can be of some use to the Germans. So I have something to do. I do not deny that I would have liked to see you; but what GÖtte liked, I also like. I know very well that I am completely useless on this journey, and that I might have done more good at home by teaching, but I could not resist the one who called me.

(3) I have no news from Wittenberg, except that Pomeranus writes that the gospel has also begun in Lübeck, and is attacking the Lüneburgers strongly, and things are progressing peacefully and righteously in those cities. Thanks be to God! Furthermore, news of new events is awaiting you. I fear very much that Germany,

To the exceedingly dear brother, N. Philipp Melanchthon, the very strong and faithful Christophorus.

Grace and peace in the Lord! My dear Philip, on the eighth of May we began to answer your letters dated from Nuremberg, but obstacles intervened that I have postponed it until now, and in the meantime we have also received a bundle of your letters to Augsburg. I have long since completed my attack on the clergy 1) and sent it to Wittenberg. I have also translated the two chapters of Ezekiel from Gog 2) and provided them with a preface, which will appear in print at the same time [with the admonition to the clergy]. After these were finished, I took the Prophets before my hand, and attacked the matter with great impetuosity; I had resolved to have all the Prophets translated before Pentecost. After that the Aesopus and others. And I would certainly have accomplished it, so the work went on.

1) No. 1000 in this volume.

2) St. Louis edition, vol. VI, 880.

But the old outward man became so weak that he could neither bear nor follow the impetuosity of the new inward man, for my head began to be filled with roaring, yes, with thunderclaps, and if I had not immediately let up, I would soon have fainted, which I have hardly escaped during the last two days. So it is now the third day that I have neither wanted nor been able to look at even one letter. "It will no longer do, I see well, the years are approaching." My Caput 3) has become a chapter, but will continue and also become a paragraph, finally a single sentence. Therefore, I am now completely idle and celebrating. But gradually this turmoil in the head subsides, supported by medicines and their help. There thou hast the cause why I have so delayed to answer. On the day your letter came from Nuremberg, Satan had his legation with me. I was alone, however, since Vitus and Cyriacus 4) were absent, and he certainly retained the victory to such an extent that he drove me out of the chamber and compelled me to go among the people. I can hardly wait for that day when we will finally see the great power of this spirit and its almost divine majesty.

(2) These are our internal matters; external are others, among which you also indicate to me that Geck [Eck] is warring anew, together with your Billicanus. "What else is there to do in the Diet?" Those rude asses think so of the things of the church, so are they minded. But they may have a good year. Magister Joachim 5) has sent me delicious food, or rather dates, and raisins, and has written to me twice in Greek. 6) But I, when I am restored, will write to him in Turkish, that he may also have something to read.

3) Luther plays here with the double meaning of eaput, head and main part; likewise oaxitulum, little head and chapter.

4) "Veit" is Veit Dietrich, whom Luther had taken with him to help him write. "Cyriacus" is a merchant.

5) Camerarius.

6) The one Greek letter is found in Kolde's leota, p. 450 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VII, p. 318; the other is missing.

what he doesn't understand?) For why does he write to me in Greek? Here I will stop, and at another time more, lest I stir up anew the appeased troubles of my head, which are already very irritable. But I pray; pray ye also.

Very gladly would I have written (as you will) to the younger prince about the landgrave (Naoeckone), also to the elder and to all of you, but I will do it in his time. The Lord be with you. Greetings to all your company. But hear thou what I wished to say above all things: behold, that, according to my example, thou mayest spoil thy head. Therefore I will command you and the whole company that they compel you under threat of banishment into the rules which serve to preserve your body, lest you become a suicide and then pretend that this is done out of obedience to God. For one serves God even by doing nothing, yes, by no thing more than by doing nothing. For for this cause hath he willed that the Sabbath should be so strictly kept above other things. See that you do not despise this. It is God's word what I write. May 12, 1530, your Martin Luther.

Luther advises Cordatus against the journey to Augsburg, and tells him what he knows about Augsburg, and how he is.

This letter is found handwritten in Wolfenbüttel, Cocl. Hs. 108, tot. 24b; there duck. 214, tot. 59 and in dock. cksu. b. 212. printed in Luckcksus, x. 106; in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 42, and in Erl. Briefw., vol. VIII, p. 9. A piece of the same is found in Huckcksus, p. 110; in Ooswstius, tom. I, praise 137, and by Walch (in the following number) as a letter addressed to Hausmann, dated June 25. But of that day there is another letter to Hausmann, which is in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 47, and in Walch's old edition, vol. XXI, 1376.

1) Luther fulfilled this promise by inserting a tailor's shake verse in a letter of reply to Camerarius, written in Hebrew letters. Camerarius was not able to decipher this, not even the Hebraists he had consulted. So he finally went to Augsburg to get information from the scholars there. They, informed by Luther, enlightened him. Mathesius reports this in his 12th sermon. Mathesius, St. Louis edition, p. 229.

Grace and peace in Christ! I have written this letter to you, dearest Cordatus, so that you may not doubt that I remember you, and may not suspect that I have forgotten my promise. For I am still in this wilderness, and there is not much hope that I shall be called to the Diet. But if I am called, you may be sure that I will send you word, as we have agreed. However, as the dear man Nicolaus Hausmann, your pastor, writes, I do not know whether it is advisable for you to go to the Diet and leave your office in the meantime, since there is still no hope at all that the princes will act on the matter of religion; or if they do act, they will do so in secret and among themselves according to the Emperor's decree, without any public disputation or interrogation. I would have answered this the other day, when I had received his letter, but no messenger soon appeared.

(2) We have not yet received any news, nor do those of us at Augsburg write to us?) From what the rumor testifies, we have gathered that it is certain that the emperor arrived at Augsburg on June 15; may Christ give grace and happiness to this, amen. Let us only pray and not cease. Christ lives and reigns; however unknown he may be to the wicked, yet to us he is the known and certain King of kings and the Lord of lords. I am quite well by the grace of God and your prayers, and although Satan has hindered me for some weeks by roaring in my head, I have translated Jeremiah into German. Now there is Ezekiel left, which I will tackle. But first I will give an alms to our poor printers, which consists of several copies, among which is also the Psalm Confitemini 3), which I will soon complete in two days.

Greetings to Mr. Nicolaus Hausmann, who is extremely dear to me. The letter from his brother

Grace and peace in Christ! I believe that you have long since heard the news from Augsburg, my dear Philip, namely, that fourteen men have been chosen as new mediators, all of whose names we know, and that you, with the corner, are the first in leading the word, and Spalatin the scribe; 3) if this is true, it is wonderful. Moreover, that the pope, after the siege of Florence has been lifted, is besieged at Rome in Castel Sant'Angelo by a Roman army. For what else shall we hermits do, but that we may indicate (xxxxxxxxxxx) news to you in much wandering manner, while meanwhile you are as silent as the frogs of Seriphos. 4)

I am sending here the Sermon on the Schools, 5) a completely Lutheran writing, which, through Luther's verbosity, does not deny its author in anything, but represents him in the most complete way. That is my way. Likewise will be the booklet of the keys 6). Then, if Christ wills, I will deal with the article of justification.

Leipzig, for about four have died of the disease, and two houses are closed off. So Luft writes to me, the others are silent, for my mistress writes nothing about this. And "Hauptman" and the younger Prince Hans Ernst are still there, which is certainly a great proof that there is no danger. I write this so that the rumor does not disturb you.

May the Lord who sent you to Heiligenstadt (Augustam) 1) make you all holy (auAustos), amen. A new kind of sore (corrosio) has arisen in my neck, so that I suspect that either the evil juices are increased by the sharpness of the wine, or that after so many years of health the old remnants [of the previous illness] are returning, or that it is Satan's fist blows. 3) I am so sorry to hear this. But if Christ alone triumphs, nothing matters whether Luther perishes, who, since Christ is victor, will be victor. Greetings to all our people. I do not know whether my letters have been delivered to you by Cyriacus and Caspar Müller, nor whether they themselves have reached you, since they have now been away from here nearly three weeks and have written nothing to us. Farewell. From the desert, on the day of Bartholomew [August 24] 1530.

Your Martin Luther.

To Melanchthon.

Luther reports the return of the Churprince; he wishes the end of the Reichstag.

This letter is found handwritten in Wolfenbüttel, 6< xl. t1;äm8t. 108, toi. 96; at Dresden, Oock. 6. 140, toi. 83 6; at the Ooä. HutEnd.; in the Oxi. kostoew. and in the 6ou. Isn. 6, tot. 116. printed at Ooewstüuus.

1) Augustus means in the first meaning: sanctified, holy. Hence we were permitted to render ^uAustum (Augsburg) by Heiligenstadt. Since the word is ambiguous, it could be translated as follows: "He who sent you to the imperial city, make all of you more of the empire.

2) In sutturs is likewise in the following number, 8 3; it is not to be translated: in the throat. Oorrosio will probably be a kind of lichen, not a "scratching in the throat".

3) De Wette offers inlsnua pUwAMn; the old translator read (perhaps more correctly) salsnm, for he translates: "das salty Geblüt". The Erl. Briefw. offers: "ulsuln.

toin. III, koi. 876; in Buddeus, p. 204; in Schütze, vol. II, p. 188; in De Wette, vol. I V, p. 164 and in Erl. Briefw., vol. VIII, p. 258. In Walch twice: once here, and again incomplete and with wrong date in this volume No. 1074. We have omitted the latter redaction and referred to this number.

Grace and peace in Christ! Yesterday our younger prince came together with Count Albrecht, unexpected and sudden guests. And I have seen with joy that they have escaped from that turmoil, for God wished that I could see you shortly as escaped ones, if it is not granted to expect you as released ones. You have done enough and more than enough; now the rest of the time is for the Lord to do it, and He will do it. Only be a man and hope in Him. I am both indignant and comforted that Eck and his opponents are dragging out the matter with this trifling quibble, for if both forms of the sacrament were claimed by us to be necessary, we would condemn the whole church and the emperor himself. After all, the wretched people have this last resort, that they raise quibbles in the presence of the emperor. Rather, let us let them confidently abuse the emperor, by which they seriously challenge him who has already drawn his bow in heaven and laid deadly projectile upon it. For so say the Turks: It is not to be supposed that so great a nation shall be condemned.

(2) If this ground of proof be good, what article of faith is there left for us to confess or keep, if the articles of faith depend on quantity? But wherefore do I treat of this in letters? You may see that you are mindful of this, that you are one of those who are called Lot in Sodom, whose souls torment those with ungodly works day and night. But it follows 132 Petr. 2, 9.j: "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the gyttfelige äps of temptation." Ye have confessed Christ, offered peace, obeyed Caesar, endured insults, been satiated with blasphemies, and have not repaid evil with evil: Summa, ye have done the holy work of GOD, as befits the saints, in a worthy manner. Rejoice also at last once in the Lord, and be glad, ye righteous [Ps. 32:11.], ye have been long enough afflicted in the world; look up, lift up your heads, your redemption draweth nigh [Luc. 21:28.]. I will exalt you, as faithful members of Christ, among the saints (oÄuoniWdo); how then can ye seek any more honour? Or is it too little that mau have rendered faithful service to Christ, and behaved as a member worthy of him? Let this be far from you, that the grace of Christ should seem so small to you. But more of this by word of mouth.

(3) I have been of sound mind these days. I suppose that the winds, which now make the castle shake and roar outside, have been in my head and will one day return to my head. The prince gave me a golden ring, but that I might see that I was not born to wear gold, it fell from my thumb to the earth (for it is a little too loose and too wide for my fingers). I said, Thou art a worm, and not a man. It should have been given to Faber and Eck; for you lead or a rope would have been more suitable, or a rope at the neck. He wanted to give me the opportunity to return home and take me with him, but I asked him to leave me here so that I could wait for you when you returned and wipe off your sweat after this bath.

I wish and pray that you may have strong and good courage, so that you will not let yourselves be troubled by the appearances and appearances of the present things, since you know that everything is entirely in the hands of him who in a moment can not only cover the sky with clouds and make it clear again, but is also in the habit of doing so, and even takes pleasure in it. Into his bosom I commend sinners to you, who are confessors and not defenders of your sins. Salute all our brethren in the Lord, who shortly absolve you, Amen. From the desert, on Thursday about 1) the equinox [15 Sept.] 1530.

1) We have retained the reading versus in Schütze and De Wette, against post in Erl. Briesw.

You must not believe anything about the plague in Wittenberg. All is well, as you have seen from the last letters.

To Justus Jonas.

Luther calms down Jonas because of the settlement action and sends a letter of the landgrave.

This letter is found handwritten in Wolfenbüttel, Oocl. Hörnst. 108, toi. 89d; in the Oock. RostOoN.; in the Ooä. Isu. d. toi. 193, and in the Oock. OotU. 451. printed in Ooelestinus, toin. III, col. 63; in Lrulckus, p. 200; in DeWette, vol. IV, p. 157and inErl. Briefw. vol. VIII, p. 236.

Grace and peace in Christ! I, my dear Jonas, have earnestly commanded Christ our cause, and he has promised me (for I believe him at any rate) that this cause is and will be his. Therefore, since I already see that the adversaries despair of violence and turn to cunning, I do not greatly fear, nay, I am rather hopeful, since I am sure that though we snore to our shame. ...yet he watches for his honor. They may boast that you have conceded many things, but they do not realize that this concession is the one greatest thing they have failed to do, and that they have lost on their side the one very good thing. "Let them go hither, the Speirish monk-larvae." 2) You may only want to know that the Gospel is excepted in all that you allow, as I did at Worms, for (as I see) the case and the course and the action are similar.

Eck, I see, also wants to be a victor of Augsburg, as he was of Leipzig. Amen, "saith Christ".

I send here (it is whimsical) the landgrave's letter to me. I have not answered it, because the hurried messenger went away. Thou wilt do in my name what he desires, and send me back, I pray thee, this letter, or bring it back to me thyself, for it pleases me well. See thou do not lose this letter in thy melancholy...

2) Compare No. 1027 in this volume, the first note, and No. 1058, § 1.

for with the same I test your fidelity and your vigilance. Farewell, my dear Jonas, and return cheerfully and safely.

I am certainly not yet freed from the roaring in my head, and the damage (urrosio) on my neck is getting worse. But I have lived and done enough. Let my hour come when it seems good to him whom I also rejoice to see, who laid down his life and blood for the sinner Luther. Farewell. From the desert, on the day of St. Augustine [August 28], not the monk, 1) 1530. Your Martin Luther.

To Conrad Cordatus.

About Luther's condition and the near end of the Reichstag.

This letter is found handwritten in Wolfenbüttel, Oocl. Reimst. 108, col. 103 and in the Oock. Rostoeck. Printed in Ooelestinus, tom. III, p. 89; in Luctceus, p. 211; in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 173, and in Erl. Briefw., vol. VIII, p. 271.

Grace and peace in Christ! This whole time, as long as I have been here, almost half of it has been lost to me through very arduous idleness, so exceedingly violent and obstinate has a roar, or rather a din similar to whirlwinds, taken possession of and tormented my head. My dear Cordatus, if it had not been for this, I might have completed everything I wished to complete in the rest of my life. Now I am forced to publish little interpretations in bits and pieces, so that I am not entirely idle. Now, however, the hubbub is beginning to subside and to give me a new break.

I have written everything I know about our Augsburg affairs to your bishop 2). Besides, I have nothing new. The princes are making off one by one. Ours is held back by the exceedingly bad

1) With this Luther will aim at the Roman Abbot Augustine, who was sent to England by Gregory I in 596.

2) Nicolaus Hausmann. The letter to the same is No. 1107 in this volume, simultaneously with this letter.

Satan is still firm there. The rest, as I believe, has also reached you through the younger prince. You, my dear Cordatus, pray the Lord for me, that he may guide and sustain me according to his good will. May he be with you and strengthen you by his Spirit, amen. Greetings to your Eva and all yours. From the castle of Coburg, 23 September 1530.

To Justus Jonas.

On the inquiry of the Catholics whether the Lutherans wanted to hand over more articles; on Zwingli and Bucer, and so on.

This letter is found handwritten in Wolfenbüttel, Oocl. Reimst. 108, col. 67; in Copenhagen, Ns. 1393, col. 307; in the Oocl. Rostoeck., in the Oocl. Ootli. 451, and in the Ooä. 3en. d. toi. 194, printed in Ooelestinus, tom. II, col. 233d; in Luclicus, p. 169; in DeWette, vol. IV, p. 109; in Schirmacher, p. 134, and in Erl. Briefw., vol. VIII, p. 133. German (incomplete) at Chyträus, p. 95 d.

Grace and peace in Christ! We have received the parcel and the bundles of letters, my dear Jonas; you are awake for once. Moreover, Philip pardons you most artfully, who have confessed that you are surpassed by me in diligent writing; but it is easy to deceive a man such as I am, who is neither a rhetorician nor a dialectician, with these arts.

(2) But I am deceived in my hope, for I thought you would come, long since beaten by an edict of the emperor. But now I see what these questions 3) wanted: whether you would have any more articles to hand over. Namely, Satan is still alive and has well noticed that your Apology, 4) the "Silent Treaders," 5) the articles on Purgatory, on the service of the saints, and especially on the Antichrist, the pope, have transitions.

(3) Alas, the poor emperor, if he has set up this imperial diet to counter Luther's speeches [against papal doctrine] (uvUloAio)

3) See No. 968 and No. 973 in this volume.

4) This is the Augsburg Confession, which was at first called npoloZin, that is, Schutzschrift.

5) Thus the Copenhagen manuscript, Buddeus and De Wette. Erl. Briefw.: "tread softly".

to hear! as if they did not care enough to answer the present apologue themselves.

(4) And that these frogs with their croakers should thus have access [to the emperor] seriously distresses me, in view of so great a work in the most important things, and 1) even if there had been nothing to do, they should not have been at liberty to do it. But this is done that I may be a true prophet, since I have always said that one labors in vain, and hope for a union in the doctrine, that it is enough if we can obtain worldly peace.

(5) To your wife (do not doubt) I will write everything and send it carefully. I am glad that Philip learns the mind of Campegius and the Welsh. Philosophy does not believe these things, for it has experienced them. I believe neither the confessor of the emperor nor any Welsh even one sound (My==Muck). For my Cajetan loved me so much that he wanted to shed blood for me, namely mine. "They are knaves." Howbeit it is true, when a Welshman is good, he is very good; but this is something

1) Instead of ut, we have assumed et.

6. Zwingli and Bucer really please me! "So shall GOtt bring them forth to the day"! Admittedly with these people let us enter into a fraternization! But after the Emperor's departure they will again be other people. "If you are not tired of the Diet, I wonder, I am tired of it." I would like to be the victim of this last Concilium, as Johann Hus at Constance was the victim of the last papal welfare (lortuuuo?). Greetings, I beseech you, all ours. May the Spirit of Christ be mighty with you, Amen. From the desert, July 21, 1530.
